Hibisceæ (hi-bis'ē-ē), n. pl. [NL., < Hibiscus + -eæ.] A tribe of plants of the natural order Malvaceæ, typified by the genus Hibiscus. It is characterized by having the column of stamens anther-bearing for a considerable part of its length, naked and truncate or 5-toothed at the apex, and a mostly 5-celled loculicidal pod.

Hibiscus (hi-bis'kus), n. [NL., < L. hibiscus, also hibiscum, < Gr. ἵβισκος, mallow.] 1. A large genus of polypetalous dicotyledonous plants (herbs, shrubs, or trees), of the natural order Malvaceæ, and the type of the tribe Hibisceæ. They are characterized by having a 5-lobed calyx, supplemented by 3 to 5 narrow bracts; by the long column of stamens, which is frequently anther-bearing for much of its length; and by the 5-valved loculicidal pod, with numerous seeds. About 150 species are known, mostly from tropical countries, but a few are natives of temperate regions. The species are remarkable for abounding in mucilage and for the tenacity of the fiber of their bark, whence several are employed for many economical purposes in their native countries. The petals of H. rosasinensis (a plant with large, handsome, usually red flowers, frequent in greenhouses) are astringent, and are used in China as a black dye for the hair and eyes. The handsome flowering shrub known in gardens as Althea frutes, or rose of Sharon, is a species of Hibiscus (H. Syriacus). The root of H. Manihot yields a mucilage used as size and to give a proper consistency to paper. The leaves of H. carnabius are edible, and an oil is extracted from its seeds: it is cultivated in India for its fiber, being known as Indian hemp. The plants of this genus are commonly known as rose-mallows. The great rose-mallow of the Carolina coast is H. coccineus. H. Moscheutos, of the United States, with rose-colored or white flowers 6 inches in diameter, is the swamp rose-mallow. H. Trionum, of Europe, with a sulphur-yellow corolla, is the bladder-ketmia or flower-of-an-hour. H. (formerly Abelmoschus) esculentus, of the West Indies and Central America, furnishes the okra or gumbo. H. Manihot is the Australian manioc. H. splendens, a native of Queensland and New South Wales, is the hollyhock-tree. H. Sabdariffa, of tropical Asia and Africa, yields the rosella-fiber. H. tiliaceus is the Tahitian peonon.

Flowering Branch of Hibiscus Moscheutos. a, flower cut longitudinally; b, stamen; c, fruit; d, embryo.

2. [L. e.] A plant of this genus. hic (hik), interj. [See hic, hick, n.] A syllable used to express the sound of a hiccup, particularly in representing the speech of a drunken person as interrupted by this sound. hic, hick (hik), n. [Of D. hik = LG. hick = Dan. hikke = Sw. hicka = W. ig = Bret. hik, a hiccup; MD. hicken, D. hicken, MD. also hicksen = G. hicken, hicksen, hicksen, v. = Dan. hikke = Sw. hicka, hiccup; cf. also the various other E. forms, hiccup, hickup, hiccough, hicket, hickot, hickock, also kink, chink, chin-cough; F. hoquet, formerly hoquet, Pers. hikuk, hukuk, Hind. hichki, huchki, huchki, a hiccup: all imitative of the sound of a hiccup.] A hiccup.

Beside vernal, estival, autumnal [garlands] made of flowers, the ancients had also hiemal garlands.

Sir T. Broune, Miscellanies, p. 92.

hiemate (hi'e-māt), v. i.; pret. and pp. hiemated, ppr. hiemating. [< L. hiematus, pp. of hiemare, pass the winter, < hiems, hiemps, winter: see hiems.] To hibernate; pass the winter. B. S. Barton, 1799.

hiemation (hi-e-mā'shōn), n. [= F. hiémation, < L. hiematio (n.), wintering, < hiemare, pass the winter: see hiemate.] 1. The passing or spending of a winter in a particular place or state; hibernation.

The American yucca is a harder plant than we take it to be: for it will suffer our sharpest winter . . . without that trouble and care of setting it in cases in our conservatories for hiemation. Evelyn, Sylva, xx.

2†. The act or condition of affording shelter during winter.

hiems (hi'émz), n. [L.; also written hiemps, and improp. hiems, winter; = Gr. χιὼν (chiōn, orig. χιου-ι), snow; cf. χιεῖα and χειμῶν, winter, = Skt. hima = Zend zima = Pers. zim (> Hind. him, hem), cold, frost, snow; see Chionis, chimeria, Himalayan.] Winter.

On old Hiems' thin and icy crown,
An odorous chaplet of sweet summer buds
Is, as in mockery, set. Shak., M. N. D., ii. 2.

hien (hyen), n.; pl. hien. [Chinese.] 1. In China, a subordinate division of a fu or department, or of an independent show; an administrative district under the control of an official styled chih-hien. In the 18 provinces of China proper there are about 1,285 hien.—2. The seat of government of such a district. Also written heen and hsien.

hiera, n. Plural of hieron.

Hieracæ (hi-e-rā'sē-ē), n. pl. [NL., < Hieracium + -æ.] A subtribe of plants belonging to the natural order Compositæ, tribe Cichoriaceæ, adopted by Bentham and Hooker (1876), typified by the genus Hieracium. It was first proposed as a tribe by Don in 1822. It is the same as the Hieracior of Cassini, and nearly the same as the Hieracia of Rueling.

Hieracite (hi'e-rā-sit), n. [< Hierax (see def.) + -ite.] A follower of Hierax, an Egyptian ascetic (about A. D. 300), who denied the resurrection of the body and the existence of a visible paradise, and taught that only the celibate could enter the kingdom of heaven.

Hieracium (hi-e-rā'si-um), n. [NL. (cf. L. hieracia, hawkweed, hieracium, a kind of eye-salve), < Gr. ἱεράκιον, also ἱεράκια, a plant, hawkweed, but not the mod. hieracium, < ἱεράς, a hawk or falcon: see Hierax.] A large genus of plants, belonging to the order Compositæ and tribe Cichoriaceæ, and type of the subtribe Hieracæ. They are perennial or rarely annual herbs, with the receptacle naked or short-fimbriate, and a fuscous pappus of rigid, fragile bristles; corollas all ligulate, 5-dentate, yellow or rarely white or red; achenia oblong or columnar, smooth and glabrous, mostly 10-ribbed or striate; leaves jeropigia, and E. accom, hickery-pickery, q. v., < ML. hiera-piera, < Gr. ἱερά, a name for many medicines in the Greek pharmacopoeia (fem. of ἱερός, sacred), + πικρά, fem. of πικρός, sharp, pungent, bitter.] A warm cathartic composed of aloes and canella made into a powder, with honey. Popularly called hickery-pickery.

hierarch (hi'e-rärk), n. [= F. hiérarque = Sp. hierarca, gerarca = Pg. hierarcha = It. gerarca, < ML. hierarchia, < Gr. ἱεράρχης, a steward or president of sacred rites, a high priest, < ἱερός, sacred (see hierō), + ἀρχος, a leader, ruler, < ἀρχεῖν, rule.] 1. One who rules or has authority in sacred things.

Angels, by imperial summons call'd,
Forthwith, from all the ends of heaven, appear'd,
Under their hierarchs in orders bright.

Milton, P. L., v. 587.

2. Specifically, in Gr. antiq., one of a body of officials or minor priests attached to some temples, as the sanctuary of Amphiaras at Oropus, who had charge of the offerings of all kinds consecrated to the god by his votaries, and of the inscribing and setting up of the records relating to them.

hierarchal (hi'e-rär-kal), a. [< hierarch + -al.] Of or pertaining to a hierarch or a hierarchy.

Now ere dim night had disincumber'd heaven,
The great hierarchal standard was to move.

Milton, P. L., v. 701.

hierarchic (hi'e-rär-k'ik), a. [= F. hiérarchique = Sp. gerárquico = Pg. jerarchico = It. gerarchico, jerarchico (cf. D. G. hierarchisch = Dan. Sw. hierarkisk), < Gr. ἱεραρχικός, < ἱεράρχης, hierarchy: see hierarchy.] Of or pertaining to a hierarchy.

hierarchial (hi'e-rär-ki-kal), a. [< hierarchic + -al.] Same as hierarchic.

They declared "That that hierarchial government was evil and justly offensive, and burdensome to the kingdom."

Clarendon, Civil War, II. 69.

The Ignatian and pseudo-Clementine bishops, who are set up as living oracles and hierarchal idols.

Schaff, Hist. Christ. Church, I. § 99.

Hierarchical classification. See classification.

hierarchically (hi'e-rär-ki-kal-i), adv. In a hierarchic manner; in conformity to ecclesiastical authority, influence, or interests; by a system of government resembling that of the church.

The society of this country [England] is hierarchically constituted.

Gladstone, Gleanings, I. 44.

The control of all elective offices by a sect hierarchically organized.

The American, XIII. 291.

hierarchism (hi'e-rär-kizm), n. [< hierarch + -ism.] Hierarchical principles or power; hierarchal character or influence; belief in or devotion to hierarchal rule.

After a few centuries, the more dominant hierarchism of the West is manifest in the oppugnancy between Greek and Latin church architecture.

Milman, Latin Christianity, xiv. 7.

hierarchy (hi'e-rär-ki), n.; pl. hierarchies (-kiz). [Early mod. E. yerarchie (Skelton), late ME. gerarchie, etc., < OF. gerarchie, F. hiérarchie = Pr. ierarchia, gerarchia = Sp. gerarquía = Pg. jerarchia = It. gerarchia, jerarchia = D. hierarchij = G. hierarchie = Dan. Sw. hierarki, < ML. hierarchia, < Gr. ἱεραρχία, the power or rule of a hierarch, < ἱεράρχης, hierarch: see hierarch.] 1. The power or dominion of a hierarch; hal- lowed or consecrated authority in what concerns religious order or government.

Consider what I have written from regard for the church established under the hierarchy of bishops.

Swift.

2. Government by ecclesiastical rulers; an ecclesiastical or priestly form of government.—3. An order of holy beings regarded as employed in divine government.

That Muske, with his heavenly harmonie,
Do not allure a heavenly mind from heaven,
Nor set men's thoughts in worldly melody,
Till heavenly Hierarchies be quite forgot.

Gascoigne, Steele Glas (ed. Arber), p. 77.

Whom the supreme King
Exalted to such power, and gave to rule,
Each in his hierarchy, the orders bright.

Milton, P. L., I. 735.

4. A body of persons organized in ranks and orders for the exercise of rule over sacred things; hence, an organized body of ecclesiastics intrusted with government of either church or state; also, a similarly organized body of officials in other systems of government: as, the Roman Catholic hierarchy.

If any one shall say that there is not in the Catholic Church a hierarchy established by the divine ordination, consisting of bishops, presbyters, and ministers, let him be anathema.

We may regard . . . the clergy or clerical estate as a body completely organized, with a minutely constituted and regulated hierarchy.

Stubbs, Const. Hist., § 376.

5. In science, a series of successive terms of different rank. The terms kingdom, order, sub-order, family, genus, and species constitute a hierarchy in zoology.

As we ascend in the hierarchy of the organisms, we meet with . . . an increasing differentiation of parts.

H. Spencer, Prin. of Biol., § 53.

Celestial hierarchy, the collective body of angels, regarded as forming a gradation of nine orders, differing in power and glory. The general belief in the church that the number of angelic orders is nine, and the assignment of a definite name and rank to each order, date from the sixth century. The first to fix the number, names, and sequence of these orders was the writer calling himself Dionysius the Areopagite, who seems to have lived about A. D. 500. The nine orders, beginning with the highest, are arranged, as follows, in three triads: I. 1, seraphim; 2, cherubim; 3, thrones. II. 4, dominations or dominions (Kyriotes); 5, virtues (Areteutes), the singular translated 'might' in the authorized version, Eph. i. 21); 6, powers (Egouia). III. 7, principalities or principedoms (Archai); 8, archangels; 9, angels.

hieratic (hi'e-rat'ik), a. [= F. hiératique, < L. hieraticus, < Gr. ἱερατικός, of or for the priest's office, sacerdotal, also devoted to sacred uses, < ἱερός, sacred: see hierarch.] 1. Pertaining to priests or to the priesthood; priestly; sacerdotal. [Rare.]

It [education in the East] was administered by the hieratic race. This was due to the fact that the priests were the only men of learning.

Payne's Compayre's Hist. of Pedagogy, p. 15.

2. Of sacred or priestly origin; due to or derived from religious use or influence: specifically used of a kind of ancient Egyptian letters or writing, and of certain styles in art. Hieratic writing consists of abridged forms of hieroglyphics adopted by the Egyptian priests for convenience and expedition in their records. Hieratic art is that which adheres to types or methods fixed and, as it were, consecrated by religious tradition, as in some Egyptian art, and in much modern Greek or Byzantine religious painting, which is still medieval in character.

Before the year 1340 our knowledge of archaic sculpture was almost limited to a few specimens in Italian museums, most of which are rather hieratic than archaic; that is to say, conventional reproductions of the archaic, executed at a much later period.

C. T. Newton, Art and Archeol., p. 74.

hieratical (hi'e-rat'i-kal), a. [< hieratic + -al.] Same as hieratic.

Hierax (hi'e-raks), n. [NL., orig. Ierax (Vigors, 1824), < Gr. ἱεραξ, a hawk, falcon. See gerfalcon.] A genus of pygmy falcons or finch-falcons of Asia, containing some of the smallest birds of prey, as H. caeruleus. Microhierax is a synonym. See Bengal falcon, under falcon.

hierdet, n. A Middle English form of herd.
Chaucer.

hierdesst, n. A Middle English form of herdest.
Chaucer.

hierō. [< L. hiero, < Gr. ἱερό, combining form of ἱερός, sacred, holy, divine, mighty, glorious, etc., prob. = Skt. ishira, vigorous, fresh, blooming.] An element in many compounds of Greek origin, meaning 'sacred, holy, divine.'

Hierochloë, Hierochloa (hi'e-rok'lo-ē, -ā), n. [NL., < Gr. ἱερός, sacred, holy, + χλόη, young green corn or grass, verdure.] A genus of odoriferous grasses, belonging to the tribe

Phalarideæ. The spikelets bear three flowers, and the flowers each two petals; the two lower flowers are staminate only (having three stamens), sessile, and often awned; the uppermost one is perfect, has a short pedicel, two stamens, and no awns; and the glume equals or exceeds the spikelet. There are about 8 species. The name holy-grass, as well as the generic name, alludes to the practice in some parts of northern Europe of strewing the common species, H. borealis (the northern holy-grass), before the doors of churches on festival days. The inhabitants of Iceland use it to scent their rooms and clothes. It is distributed through northern Europe, Asia, and America, occurring also in New Zealand. Also called vanilla or sensou-grass.

hierocracy (hi'e-rok'-rā-si), n.; pl. hie cracies (-siz). [< Gr. ἱερός, sacred, holy, + -κρατία, < κράτειν, rule.] 1. Govern-ment by or dominant influence of ecclesiastics; hierarchy. Jefferson. [Rare.]—2. The sacerdotal class; priests collectively. [Rare.]

a, flower; b, fruit.

often toothed, but never lobed. Nearly 300 species have been described, widely distributed throughout the temperate regions of both hemispheres. About 25 species are North American. Hawkweed is the name generally given to them. H. venosum, a native of the eastern United States, is called rattlesnake-weed. H. aurantiacum, a common European species, is known in England as grim-the-collier, on account of the black hairs which clothe the flower-stalk and involucre. H. praetense, also a European species, has become naturalized in restricted localities in northern New York, where it is known as the king-devil. H. pilosella of Europe is there called mouse-ear.

hieracosphinx (hi'e-rā-kō-sfingks), n. [< Gr. ἱεράς, a hawk, + σφίγξ, sphinx.] The hawk-headed sphinx of Egypt, as distinguished from the androsphinx and criosphinx.

hiera-picra (hi'e-rā-pik'rā), n. [= F. hièrepierre = Pg. hierapiera (cf. It. jera) = Sp. jeropigia, Holy-grass (Hierochloa borealis).

a, spikelet.

The temple was a sort of priestly citadel, the fortress as well as the sanctuary of the hierocracy.
Encyc. Brit., XXIII. 167.

hierodule (hí'e-rō-dūl), n. [< Gr. iepós, sacred, holy, + δούλος, a bondman, slave.] In Gr. antiq., a slave dedicated to the service of a divinity; a temple servant or attendant. Large numbers of such slaves were attached to some foundations, and were either employed about the sanctuary or let out for hire for the profit of the god.

Hierofalco (hí'e-rō-fal'kō), n. [ML. = see gerfalco.] A genus or subgenus of northern falcons; the gerfalcons.

hieroglyph (hí'e-rō-glif), n. [= D. hieroglyph = G. hieroglyph = Dan. Sw. hieroglyf, < F. hieroglyphe = Pg. jeroglífico; < Gr. iepós, sacred, + γλῶφῃ, a carving: see hieroglyphic.] 1. The figure of any object, especially a familiar object, as an animal, tree, weapon, staff, etc., standing for a word, or a syllable, or a part of a syllable, or a single sound; a figure representing an idea, and intended to convey a meaning, thus forming part of a mode of written communication. The name was first applied to the engraved marks and symbols found on the monuments and other records of ancient Egypt. Of these, some signified directly the objects represented by them; others, conceptions suggested by those objects; others, ideas having names identical with or closely resembling the names of the objects represented; others, part of the sounds composing those names, or even only their initial sounds—these last being nearly a true alphabet, and used especially in writing proper names. The name, which had its origin in the idea that the sculptured symbols were exclusively sacerdotal, is now given to any writing of a similar character, as that of the ancient Mexicans, Peruvians, etc.

If all the hieroglyphs of the Egyptians had been A B C to you, still, if you did not know the anaglyph, you would know nothing of the true mysteries of the priest.

Bulwer, Caxtons, vii. 7.

2. Any figure, character, or mark having or supposed to have a mysterious or enigmatical significance.

Fair Nature's priestesses! to whom,
In hieroglyph of bud and bloom, Her mysteries are told. Whittier, To — hieroglyph (hí'e-rō-glif), v. t. [< Gr. iepoγλυφῶν, engrave hieroglyphics, engrave hieroglyphically; < iepoγλῡφός, a carver of hieroglyphics: see hieroglyph, n., hieroglyphic.] To write in hieroglyphs; represent by means of hieroglyphs.

hieroglyphic (hí'e-rō-glif'ik), a. and n. [= F. hieroglyphique = Sp. geroglífico = Pg. jeroglífico = It. geroglifico; < LL. hieroglyphicus, < Gr. iepoγλῡφικός, hieroglyphic, neut. pl. τὰ iepoγλῡφικά (se, γλῡφῡτά), a form of inscriptions used for Egyptian sacred records, < iepoγλῡφός, a carver of hieroglyphs, < iepós, sacred, + γλῡφῡν, hollow out, carve, engrave, write in incised characters: see glyph.] 1. a. 1. Expressed in hieroglyphs; written in or inscribed with symbolic characters: as, the hieroglyphic language of Egypt; hieroglyphic records; a hieroglyphic obelisk. 2. See the nouns.—High gravels. See gravel.—High jinks. (a) A merry old pastime in Scotland. In the usual manner of playing, a person was chosen by lot to sustain some fictitious character, or to repeat verses in a particular order, and if he failed he incurred certain forfeits.

The frolicsome company had begun to practise the ancient and now forgotten pastime of High Jinks.

Scott, Joy Manner, xxxvi.

Hence—(b) Boisterous sport or jollity; romping games or play.

There was nothing but sport

And High Jinks going on night and day at "the court."
Barham, Ingoldsby Legends, II. 313.

He found the eleven at high jinks after supper; Jack Raggles shouting comic songs, and performing feats of strength.

T. Hughes, Tom Brown at Rugby, II. 8.

(c) Tantrums; fits of ill humor. [Colloq.] (d) The throwing of dice to determine who shall empty the cup. Habit-week—High license, light, etc. See the nouns.—High life, the style of living, manners, etc., in high or fashionable society; hence, collectively, the people composing such society.

They would talk of nothing but high life, and high-lived company, with other fashionable topics.

Goldsmith, Vicar, ix.

High living, rich or luxurious fare.—High mass. See mass.—High Mightiness, a title of respect sometimes used toward sovereigns, etc. The States General of the Netherlands were styled their High Mightinesses.

2 Ki. xviii. 4.

High priest, relief, school, etc. See the nouns.—High seas. (a) The open sea or ocean; the highway of waters. (b) In law: (1) As used to designate the area transactions within which are subject to cognizance in courts of admiralty, formerly the waters of the ocean exterior to low-water mark, but now extended with the flow of the tide to high-water mark, returning with the ebb to low-water mark. (2) As used to designate the area which is not within the territorial jurisdiction of any nation, but the free highway of all nations, the waters of the ocean exterior to a line parallel to the general direction of the shore, and distant a marine league therefrom. The distance was fixed with reference to the fact that, at the time when it was fixed, it was the limit of the area of coast-waters which could be commanded by cannon on the shore. It is to be drawn with reference to headlands, so as to include in the territorial jurisdiction those inlets and arms of the sea over which the nation may justly claim and actually enforce its power. The application of the rule to bays and to arms of the sea bounding two countries often involves great difference of opinion. The great lakes are not deemed high seas.—High table, in the University of Oxford, the table at which the fellows and some other privileged persons dine.

Wine is not generally allowed in the public hall, except to the high table. De Quincey, Life and Manners (Oxford).

Haughty, as is his pile high-built and proud.

Milton, S. A., l. 1009.

High-church (hi'chérch'), a. Exalting the authority of the church; laying great stress on church authority and jurisdiction: used specifically of those in the Anglican Church who are known as High-churchmen, and of their principles. See High-churchman. [The term High-church first came into use to designate those who held to the independent authority of the spirituality at the time James II. put the bishops in the Tower (1688) for refusing to read publicly the Declaration of Indulgence.]

High-churchism (hi'chérch'izm), n. [< High-church + -ism.] The principles of High-churchmen.

High-churchman (hi'chérch'man), n. One of those members of the Anglican Church who maintain or attach especial importance to certain strict views of doctrine. The points upon which they chiefly insist are the following: (1) the necessity of apostolic succession, canonical jurisdiction, and conformity to the teachings of the undivided catholic church in order to constitute a true and lawful branch of the church; (2) the sacerdotal character of the Christian priesthood; (3) that grace is conferred in the sacraments or sacramental rites, including confirmation, absolution, etc., on all who receive them lawfully and without opposing a moral or spiritual obstacle. Many High-churchmen, believing that the maintenance of the catholic character and historical continuity of the Anglican Church involves the continuance or revival of ancient ritual, give ritual and ceremonies a prominent place in their teaching and practice. Those who go furthest in this direction are popularly called extreme High-churchmen and ritualists.

high-cockalorum (hi'kok-a-lō'rum), n. [< high + cock, vaguely used with an unmeaning Latin-seeming termination.] A game in which one boy jumps on the back of another, crying "high-cockalorum."

2. One of certain geometrical moths: an English collectors' name. The ruddy high-flier is Ypsipetes ruberata; the July high-flier is Y. elutata.—Purple high-flier. Same as emperor, 3 (a) (2).

high-flown (hī'flon), a. 1. Raised to a high pitch; elevated; elated.

This stiff-neck'd pride nor art nor force can bend,
Nor high-flown hopes to Reason's lure descend.
Sir J. Denham, Prudence.

We that are angry and pleas'd every half Hour, having nothing at all of all this high-flown Fury!
Steele, Grief à la-Mode, ii. 1.

2. Enthusiastic; extravagant; bombastic.

This fable is a high-flown hyperbole upon the miseries of marriage. Sir R. L'Estrange.

Sir Piercie Shafton found leisure to amuse the time in high-flown speeches and long anecdotes. Scott, Monastery, xxix.

high-flying (hī'fli'ing), a. Extravagant in conduct, aims, or pretensions; having lofty notions; going or carried to extremes.

That same exquisite obscuring of number and measure in words, and that high flying liberty of conceit proper to the Poet, did seem to have some dyuine force in it.

Sir P. Sidney, Apol. for Poetrie.

Clip the wings
Of their high-flying arbitrary kings.
Dryden, tr. of Virgil's Georgics, iv. 161.

But the young man [Sheridan] was romantically magnanimous and highflying in his sense of honour.

Mrs. Oliphant, Sheridan, p. 41.

highgate, n. [ME. heie gate: see high and gate.] A highway.

Then should many worthy spirits get up the highgate of preferment, and idle drones should not come nearer than the Dunstable highway of obscurity.

A youth . . . once induced a high-hole to lay twenty-nine eggs, by robbing her of an egg each day.

The Century, XXXII. 277.

high-hook (hī'hūk), n. Same as high-line.

high-keyed (hī'kēd), a. 1. High-strung; intent; eager.

She sat from Sunday to Sunday under Dr. Stern's preaching.

With a high-keyed, acute mind, she could not help listening and thinking; and such thinking is unfortunate, to say the least.

H. B. Stowe, Oldtown, p. 215.

2. In music, at a high pitch.

highland (hī'land), n. and a. [Sc. hieland; = D. hoogland = G. hochland = Dan. højland = Sw. högland; as high + land.] 1. n. 1. An abrupt elevation of land; a high promontory or plateau: as, a jutting highland.—2. pl. An elevated region broken into hills and mountains: often used as a proper name: as, the Highlands of Scotland; the Hudson Highlands; the highlands of Abyssinia.

Farewell to the Highlands, farewell to the North,
The birth-place of valour, the country of worth.

Burns, My Heart's in the Highlands.

He never gave vent to his passion until he got fairly among the highlands of the Hudson.

Irving, Knickerbocker, p. 252.

Having thus sketched the history of earth sculpture and summarized its results, we make examination of the Highlands. This region is defined to include that part of Scotland which lies to the north and west of a line drawn from the mouth of the Clyde through Dumbartonshire, Stirlingshire, Perthshire, Forfarshire, to Stonehaven on the Kincardine coast. Westminster Rev., CXXVIII. 762.

II. a. Pertaining or belonging to high lands or to mountainous regions, especially (with a capital) the Highlands of Scotland: as, highland scenery; highland vegetation.

A Highland lad my love was born,
The Lawland laws he held in scorn.

It [music] will perform all this in an instant, cheare up the countenance, expell austerity, bring in hilarity. Burton, Anat. of Mel., p. 297.

With thought, with the ideal, is immortal hilarity, the rose of joy. Round it all the Muses sing. Emerson, Love.

=Syn. Hilarity, Joy, Glee, Joviality; gaiety, exhilaration. Joy is not often used of the excitement or overflow of animal spirits, but is rather and almost distinctively an affection of the mind. Glee is a strong word for an acute or ecstatic pleasure that expresses itself in mirthfulness and other demonstrative signs of high spirits. Joviality is that feeling or character which, being itself gay, merry, or jolly, brings others into the same mood; the word is generally used in a good sense. Hilarity is more often, but not necessarily, used of mirth, laughter, or other signs of exhilaration exceeding the limits of reason or propriety. See animation, mirth, gladness, happiness.

Every morning waked us to a repetition of toll; but the evening repaid it with vacant hilarity. Goldsmith, Vicar, v.

And often, glad no more,
We wear a face of joy, because We have been glad of yore.

Wordsworth, The Fountain.

Full well they laughed with counterfeited glee
At all his jokes, for many a joke had he.
Goldsmith, Des. VII., l. 201.

Hilarymas, n. [< ME. Hilarymesse; < Hilary, LL. Hilarius, + -massa] The feast of St. Hilary, bishop of Poitiers in France about 353-68, eminent as a church father and an opponent of the Arians. In English calendars, in both those before the Reformation and that of the present English Prayer-Book, his day is January 18th, the octave of the Epiphany. In the Roman calendar it is January 14th.

hilt (hilt), n. [< ME. hilt, < AS. hilt = Icel. hjalt = Dan. hjalte = OHG. helza, MHG. helze, a hilt; perhaps lit. that by which the weapon is held, being prob. ult. connected with *hold*¹, as anvil, formerly an-filt, etc., with *fold*¹.] 1. That part of a sword, dagger, or similar weapon which affords a grasp for the hand, and usually a protection for it as well. The part grasped is called the grip, into which the tang of the blade is driven, or which consists of two separate pieces secured to the tang on both sides. The pommel is the projecting ball, disc, or similar appendage, which prevents the hand from slipping from the grip and sometimes serves to counterbalance the blade. The guard is a cross-guard formed of two quillons, or a knuckle-bow, or a basket-hilt, or a combination of these different forms; sometimes also there are two shells or quillons, one on either side of the hilt, and sometimes there is a kind of inverted bowl or cup of steel surrounding the heel of the blade, and called the cup-guard. (See the above terms, and sword.) Formerly taken in the plural, with reference to its combined parts.

Arthur toke the swerde be the *hilt*es, and with-oute more tarynge yaf it to the Archebisschop.

Martin (E. E. T. S.), i. 103.

For now sits Expectation in the air,
And hides a sword, from hilt unto the point.

Tennyson, Coming of Arthur.

2†. A sword or foil.

Fetch the *hilt*s; fellow Juniper, wilt thou play?
B. Jonson, Case is Altered, ii. 7.

3†. The handle of a shield. Halliwell.—Up to the hilt or *hilt*s, thoroughly; completely; driven home.

I was up to the *hilt*s in joy at having so marvellously metamorphosed an ex-governor into a vicary.

Smollett, tr. of Gil Blas, xi. 13.

Ah! ah! there she has nick'd her; that's up to the *hilt*s; I gad, and you shall see Dapple resents it.

Prior, Travesty of Hind and Panther.

hilted (hil'ted), a. [< hilt + -ed.] 1. Furnished with a hilt: used in composition: as, a basket-hilted sword.

Wearing neither hunting-dress
Nor weapon, save a golden-hilted brand.

Tennyson, Geraint.

2. In her., having a hilt represented as of a different tincture from the blade: as, a sword hilted or.

Hilton's muscle. See epiglot-tideus.

hilum (hi'lum), n.; pl. hila (-lä). [NL., < L. hilum, said to have meant orig. 'the eye of a bean', but used only in sense of 'a little thing, bit, trifle' (> the negative hil, nil); said to be ult. a var. of filum, a thread: see *file*³.] 1. In bot., originally, the eye of a bean; hence, the mark or scar on a seed produced by separation from its placenta.

Also applied to the nucleus of starch-grains, under the mistaken notion that it was the point of attachment of the grain while growing.

Sword-hilt.

A, grip or barrel; B, pommel; C, C', quillons, which together form the cross-guard; D, finger-guard or knuckle-bow; E, pommel, one on each side of the cross-guard, projecting boldly, and nearly circular in shape; F, counter-guard; G, heel of blade, talon, or ricasso (ricasso only when the heel is square, not edged). C D E together form the guard. (From "L'Art pour Tous.")

2. In zool. and anat., some part or thing like the hilum of a seed, as a scar, pit, recess, or opening for entrance or exit. Specifically—(a) A recess, as in the kidney or the lung, where the vessels, nerves, and associate structures enter, together with a quantity of connective tissue or hilum stroma. a, hook-and-eye or gate hinge; b, strap-hinge; c, cross-garnet hinge; d, blind or self-shutting hinge; e, butt-hinge or fast-joint butt.

lation of a door, gate, shutter, lid, etc., to its support, or of two equally movable parts, as of a fire-screen, to each other. A metallic hinge for a door or the like consists of the two leaves or straps, the knuckle or rounded and perforated projection in alternate parts at their inner ends, by which they are joined, and the pin or pintle which passes through the knuckle and on which the hinge turns.

The gate self-open wide,
On golden hinges turning. Milton, P. L., v. 255.

2. A natural movable joint; an anatomical articulation turning in a single plane, as that of the knee or of a bivalve shell. See hinge-joint, and cut under bivalve.

Let the candied tongue lick absurd pomp,
And crook the pregnant fawnings of the knee,
Where thrift may follow fawning.

Shak., Hamlet, iii. 2.

3. Figuratively, that on which anything depends or turns; a cardinal or controlling principle, rule, or point.

We usually call reward and punishment the two hinges upon which all government turns.

Swift, Gulliver's Travels, I. 6.

My honoured Mother, she who was the heart
And hinge of all our learnings and our loves.

Wordsworth, Prelude, v.

4. One of the cardinal points, north, south, east, or west.

Nor slept the winds
Within their stony caves, but rush'd abroad
From the four hinges of the world.

Milton, P. R., iv. 415.

5. In entom., the cardo or basal part of the maxilla. See cut under Insecta.—Blank hinge, a hinge which permits the door to swing open in either direction. Car-builder's Dict.—Butt-and-strap hinge, a hinge of which one side carries a strap and the other a butt.—Butt-hinge. Same as butt². 4.—Cross-tail hinge, cross-tailed hinge. Same as garnet-hinge.—Dovetail hinge, a hinge the attaching parts of which spread out like a dove's tail, and are narrower at their point of juncture than at the outer edges.—Gooseneck hinge. Same as gooseneck.—Off the hinges, in a state of disorder or irregularity.

I find that Matters are much off the Hinges 'twixt the King of Denmark and his Town. Hovell, Letters, I. vi. 1.

Rising hinge, a hinge having a spiral groove winding about the knuckle, by the action of which the door is lifted as it swings open, and thus clears the carpet.—Strap-hinge, a hinge carrying a long band of metal on each side, by which it is secured to the door and to the post.

hinge (hing), v.; pret. and pp. hinged, ppr. hinging. [< hinge, n.] 1. trans. 1. To furnish with hinges; join by means of hinges, literally or figuratively.

The soul is too nicely and keenly hinged to be wrenched without mischief. D. G. Mitchell, Reveries of a Bachelor.

2. To bend the hinge or hinges of. [Poetical.]
Be thou a flatterer now, and . . . hinge thy knee.

Shak., T. of A., iv. 3.

3. Figuratively, to cause to depend: as, to hinge one's acceptance upon some future event.

II. intrans. To stand, depend, or turn on or as if on a hinge: chiefly figurative.

The vulgar should be particularly regarded, whose behaviour in civil life is totally hinged upon their hopes and fears. Goldsmith, English Clergy.

All such objections hinge on the question whether we really know how old the world is, and at what periods the various forms of life first appeared.
Darwin, Origin of Species, p. 314.

hinge-band (hing'band), n. The strap of a hinge.

hinge-joint (hing'joint), n. In anat., an articulation admitting of motion in only one plane; a ginglymus. The elbow-joint is a good example.

hinge-line (hing'lin), n. The margin of either valve of a bivalve mollusk which is hinged and bears the ligament, and also the cardinal teeth if there are any.

hinge-pillar (hing'pil'är), n. That side of the frame of the door of a carriage which supports the hinge. It corresponds to the hinging-post of the door of a house.

hinge-pin (hing'pin), n. A pin or pintle which fastens together the parts of a hinge.

The distance from the face of the breech-action to the hinge-pin has been considerably shortened.

W. W. Greener, The Gun, p. 215.

hinger, n. [Var. of hanger.] A hanging; a curtain.

I'll put gowd hingers roun' your cage,
And siller roun' your war'.
The Earl of Mar's Daughter (Child's Ballads, I. 171).

hinge-tooth (hing'tōth), n. One of the cardinal teeth of a bivalve mollusk, entering into the hinge of the valves. See cut under bivalve.

hingle (hing'gl), n. [< ME. hengele, hengel, dim. of henge, hinge: see hinge.] A hinge; a hook. [Prov. Eng.]

hingra (hing'grä), n. [Hind. hing, asafetida: see hing².] An adulterated or impure asafetida sold in the Bombay bazaars. U. S. Dispensatory.

hink (hink), n. [Prob. of LG. origin, < LG. henk, a hook, a handle, = G. ge-henk, hook, handle, belt, dim. henkel, hook, handle, etc.: see hinge.] A hook or twibill for reaping. Loudon.

hinnaire (hin'i-ät), v. i. [Improp. < L. hinnire, neigh: see hinny².] To neigh. B. Jonson.

hinnable (hin'i-bl), a. [< LL. hinnibilis, that neighs, < F. hinnir (> F. hinnir), neigh: see hinny².] Neighing, or capable of neighing. [Rare.]

Men are rational, and horses hinnable. Mansel.

hinny¹ (hin'i), n.; pl. hinnies (-iz). [With dim. term. -y², < L. hinnus, fem. hinna, a mule from a stallion and a she-ass, distinguished from ginnus, < Gr. γῖνος, sometimes written γῖνος, γῖνος, and later ἴνος (without rough breathing, but appar. due to the L. hinnus), a stunted mule, from a mare and an ass.] A mule got from a she-ass by a stallion.

hinny² (hin'i), v. i.; pret. and pp. hinnied, ppr. hinnying. [Appar. an alteration of whinny, q. v., in simulation of the different but like imitative word L. hinnire (pres. ind. hinnio), neigh; cf. Hind. hinhinna, hinma, hinsna, bray, neigh, whine.] To neigh; whinny.

hinny³ (hin'i), n. A dialectal (Scotch) variant of honey.

Nor Mountain-bee, wild bummin roves,
For hinny 'mang the heather.

Rev. J. Nicol, Poems, I. 34.

O, hinny, ay; I see be silent or thou shalt come to ill.
Scott, Old Mortality, viii.

hinoid (hin'oid), a. [Irreg. (with unorig. aspirate) < Gr. ἴς (iv-), a muscle or nerve, also strength (orig. fic* = L. vis, strength: see vim and violent), + oid, form.] In bot., having leaves the veins of which proceed entirely from the midrib, and are parallel and undivided, as in the Musaceae and Zingiberaceae.

hinoideous (hi-noi'dē-us), a. [hinoid + -eous.] Having a hinoid venation.

hint¹ (hint), v. [ME. hīnten, hynten (def. 1), var. of henten, lay hold of, seize, catch: see *hent*¹. The form hent has become obs. in E., while the var. hint, in a deflected sense, partly due to the noun hint, opportunity, etc., has assumed the appearance of another word, the etym. of which has been sought elsewhere. The relation of hint to hent is like that of clinch to clench or of glint to glent.] I. trans. 1. To lay hold of; seize; snatch: a dialectal variant of *hent*¹.—2. To suggest in an indirect manner; indicate by allusion or implication; give a hint of.

Off have you hinted to your brother peer
A certain truth, which many buy too dear.

Pope, Moral Essays, iv. 39.

Still rung these words in Wilfrid's ear,
Hinting he knew not what of fear.

Scott, Rokeby, ii. 23.

Perhaps one may venture to hint that the animal instincts are those that stand in least need of stimulation.
Lowell, Among my Books, 2d ser., p. 168.

=Syn. 2. Hint, Intimate, Suggest, Insinuate. To hint is to convey an idea in the lightest possible manner, and especially by implication: to let one's thought be known in an indirect, hesitating or partial manner. To intimate is to convey one's meaning more plainly than by a hint, but still not directly or explicitly. Suggest has a somewhat wide range, often meaning essentially the same as propose or remind (one) of, and ranging down to the meaning of hint: as, to suggest a plan; to suggest more than one says. Insinuate is now generally used in a bad sense; when used in a good sense, it implies pains taken and delicacy of skill. Hints and intimations are always covert, intimations often, suggestions rarely. An innuendo is a peculiarly dark, crafty, or mean insinuation.

II. intrans. To make an indirect reference, suggestion, or allusion.—To hint at, to allude to; refer to or suggest in a vague manner.

One, in whom all evil fancies clung Like serpent eggs together, laughingly
Would hint at worse in either.

Tennyson, Enoch Arden.

=Syn. Allude (to), Refer (to), etc. See advert, v. 1.

hint¹ (hint), n. [Early mod. E. also hynt; a var. of *hent*¹, n.; from the verb.] 1. An act of exertion; a snatch: as, in a hint, in a moment. Jamieson. [Obsolete or Scotch.]-2. An opportunity; a fit time. Jamieson. [Obsolete or Scotch.]

Wherein of antres vast, and desarts idle, Rough quarries, rocks, and hills whose heads touch heaven,
It was my hint to speak.

Shak., Othello, i. 3.

3. A suggestion made indirectly; a covert suggestion or implication; an indirect indication, conveyed by speech, gesture, action, or circumstance, whether intentional or unintentional.

I was very civilly entertained by him [the head priest among the Jews], and gave him several hints that I was desirous to take up my abode with him; but he would not seem to understand me.

Pococke, Description of the East, II. i. 76.

Sometimes he [Chaucer] describes amply by the mere hint, as where the Friar, before setting himself softly down, drives away the cat.
Lowell, Study Windows, p. 282.

hint² (hint), adv. [By aphoresis from ahint.] Behind. [Scotch.]

hinterland (hin'ter-land), n. [G., < hinter, back, + land, country.] Territory that lies back of and is tributary to a coast region or port.

The province of Shantung is the hinterland of the very large harbor the Germans have seized.

Bulletin Amer. Geog. Soc., XXX. 57.

hinting (hin'ting), n. Same as henting.

hintingly (hin'ting-li), adv. In a hinting manner; suggestively.

hip¹ (hip), n. [ME. hiþe, huþe, hyþe, < AS. hyþe = D. heuþe, formerly also huþe, hyþe = OHG. huf, MHG. huf, G. hüfte (with excrement) = Icel. huppr = Sw. höft = Dan. høfte (after G. f) = Goth. hups, hip; perhaps = Gr. κῑβος, the hollow above the hips (of cattle), appar. a particular use of κῑβος, a die, cube (see cube). Cf. Lith. kumpis, fore quarter of pork. Cf. hump and heap.] 1. The projecting part of an animal formed by the side of the pelvis and the upper part of the femur, with the flesh covering them; the upper part of the thigh; the haunch. The most protuberant part is directly over the trochanter of the thigh-bone. In man the hip may be said to begin where the waist ends, with the arched upper border of the pelvis on each side, to extend the whole length of the pelvis, and to include the upper part of the thigh-bone, together with the soft parts covering this and the side of the pelvis.

The whole quire hold their hips, and loffe.

Shak., M. N. D., ii. 1.

Her elbows pinion'd close upon her hips.

Couper, Truth, I. 133.

2. The hip-joint.—3. In entom., the coxa or first joint of an insect's leg.—4. In arch.: (a) The external angle at the junction of two sloping roofs or sides of a roof. (b) The rafter at the angle where two sloping roofs or sides of a roof meet. See cuts under hip-roof and jack-rafter.—To have or catch on the hip, to have or get the advantage over (one): a phrase borrowed probably from wrestlers.

I'll have our Michael Cassio on the hip.
Shak., Othello, ii. 1.

Nay, now I know I have him on the hip,
I'll follow it.

Fletcher (and another), Noble Gentleman, ii. 1.

hip¹ (hip), v. t.; pret. and pp. hipped, ppr. hipping. [*< hip*¹, n.] 1. To sprain, gall, or injure the hip of. In the extract the sense is doubtful.

His horse hipped with an old mothy saddle, and stirrups of no kindred.

Shak., T. of the S., iii. 2.

2. In arch., to furnish with a hip: as, to hip a roof.—3. To throw (one's adversary) over the hip. Davies.

And a prime wrestler as e'er tript,
E'er gave the Cornish hug or hip.

Cotton, Burlesque upon Burlesque, p. 202.

hip², hep (hip, hep), n. [Different shortenings of reg. heep; < ME. hepe, hepe (hepe), < AS. heope, the fruit of the dogrose, also (ONorth. dat. heope, heape) a bramble, heop-bræmel, hip-bramble, dogrose, = OS. hiopo = OHG. hiufo, MHG. hiefe, a bramble-bush. Origin unknown; not connected with OBUlg. shipukū, Bulg. shipuk, rose, Russ. shipū, Bohem. ship, a thorn, etc.] The fruit of the dogrose or wild brier, Rosa canina or R. rubiginosa.

Sweet as is the bremble flour
That bereth the reede hepe.

Chaucer, Sir Thopas, i. 36.

The oaks bear mast, the briars scarlet hips.

Shak., T. of A., iv. 3.

Where thou shalt eat of the hips and haws,

And the roots that are so sweet.

The West-Country Damosel's Complaint (Child's Ballads, II. 384).

Almost every autumn may be heard the remark that a hard winter is coming, for that the hips and haws are abundant.
H. Spencer, Study of Sociol., p. 25.

hip³ (hip), v. i.; pret. and pp. hipped, ppr. hipping. [< ME. hiþpen, huppen, hyþpen, < AS. hiþpan* (= OD. huppen = OHG. hiþfen*, MHG. hiþfen, G. hiþfen), hip, a secondary form of hoppian, ME. hoppen, E. hop: see *hop*¹.] To hop. [Obsolete or prov. Eng.]

Hope can hipping after that hadde so ybosted
How he with Moyses maundened, hadde many men

Piers Plowman (B), xvii. 59.

And old wyves that myght evyll goo,

They hipped on theyr staves.

Lytell Geste of Robyn Hode (Child's Ballads, V. 119).

hip⁴, hyp (hip), n. [Abbr. of hypochondria, q. v.] A morbid depression of spirits; melancholy: usually in the plural.

When his mind is serene, when he is neither in a passion, nor in the hips (solicitus), nor in liquor, then, being in private, you may kindly advise him.

N. Bailey, tr. of Colloquies of Erasmus, p. 130.

Heaven send thou hadst not got the Hyps.

How? Not a word come from thy lips?

Swift, Cassinus and Peter.

A little while ago thou wast all hip and vapour, and now thou dost nothing but patronise fun.

Miss Burney, Camilla, vi. 10.

hip⁴, hyp (hip), v. t.; pret. and pp. hipped, hipped, hipt, or hypt, ppr. hipping or hyppling. [*< hip*⁴, hyp, n.] To render hypochondriac or melancholy: scarcely used except as in the participial adjective hipped. See *hipped*².

hip⁵ (hip), interj. [A mere introductory syllable.] An exclamation used in applauding or giving the signal for applause: as, hip, hip, hurrah!

There is no rising from [it dinner], but to toss off the glass, and huzza after the hip! hip! hip! of the toast giver.
Hone's Every-Day Book, II. 12.

hip-bath (hip'bath), n. A form of portable bath, intended for sitting in, so that only the hips and the lower part of the trunk are submerged. Also called sitz-bath.

hip-belt (hip'belt), n. Same as hip-girdle, 2.

hipberry (hip'ber'i), n.: pl. hipberries (-iz). The hip or fruit of Rosa canina, the dogrose.

hip-bone (hip'bōn), n. [< ME. hepe-boon; < *hip*¹ + *bone*¹.] The ischium, or inferior part of the pelvis on each side: loosely extended to the whole innominate bone which forms each side of the pelvis, and to the upper part of the thigh-bone. Also called haunch-bone.

Wounded sore and evyll be gone,

And brokyn was hys hepe-boon.

MS. Cantab. ff. ii. 33, f. 122. (Halliwell.)

hip-brier (hip'brī'ēr), n. The wild brier, Rosa rubiginosa. Also called hip-rose.

hip-girdle (hip'gēr'dl), n. 1. The pelvic arch or girdle. See girdle.—2. The sword-belt of the latter part of the fourteenth century, which passed diagonally from the waist on the right side and behind to the left hip: so named to distinguish it from the earlier sword-belt, which fitted closely around the waist. Also called hip-belt.

hip-gout (hip'gout), n. Sciatica.

These clothes will never fadge with me: a pox o' this filthy vardingale, this hip-hapet!

Thus while he strives to please, he's forc'd to do't
Like Volciscus, hip-hop in a single boot.

Congreve.

hip-joint (hip'joint), n. The articulation of the femur or thigh-bone with the innominate bone or haunch-bone; the proximal articulation of the hind limb, corresponding to the shoulder-joint of the fore limb. The head of the femur is received into the acetabulum or cotyloid cavity at the junction of the ilium, ischium, and pubis, thus constituting a ball-and-socket joint, capable of movement in every direction, and uniting to a remarkable degree mobility with stability.—Hip-joint disease. See disease.

hip-knob (hip'nob), n. In arch., a finial or other similar ornament placed on the top of the hip of a roof, or on the apex of a gable. When used upon timber gables, the lower part of the hip-knob generally terminates in a pendant. See cut under hip-roof.

hipplings, adv. [*< hip*¹ + *-ling*².] By the hips.

It was a woman child, stillborn, about two months before the just time, having life a few hours before; it came hipplings till . . . [the midwife] turned it.

Winthrop, Hist. New England, I. 314.

hip-lock (hip'lok), n. In wrestling, a close grip, in which one of the contestants places a leg and hip in front of the other contestant, and attempts to push him over them to the ground.

The Tartar broke the sash and shoulder hold, rushed in fiercely, caught him around the body, and, with a hip-lock and a tremendous heave, threw him over his head.
The Century, XXXVI. 373.

hip-molding, hip-mold (hip'mōl'ding, hip'mōld), n. In arch., a molding on the rafter that forms the hip of a roof. By some workmen the word is used to signify the back of a hip.

Hippa (hip'pā), n. [NL., < Gr. ἵππος, a horse, a sea-fish: see hippus.] The typical genus of the family Hippidae.

The Brazilian H. emerita is an example. The animals burrow in the sand. H. talpoides is called sand-bug in the United States.

Hipparion (hi-pā'ri-on), n. [NL., < Gr. ἵππαριον, a pony, dim. of ἵππος, a horse: see hippus.] A genus of Miocene and Pliocene fossil horses, of the family Equidae, having three toes, a median functional hoof with a false hoof on each side.

The species are regarded as in the direct line of descent of the living horse; they were of comparatively small size, from that of a goat to that of an ass. H. gracile is an example. Also called Hippotherium. Christol, 1834.

Hipparitherium (hi-pā-ri-thē'ri-um), n. [NL., < Gr. ἵππαριον, a pony (see Hipparion), + θηρίον, a wild beast.] Same as Anchitherium. Christol.

Hippeastree (hip-ē-as'trē-ē), n. pl. [NL., < Hippeastrum + -ea.] A subtribe of monocotyledonous plants, of the natural order Amaryllidaceae, tribe Amarylleae, established by Kunth in 1850, and typified by the genus Hippeastrum.

Hippeastrum (hip-ē-as'trum), n. [NL., < Gr. ἵππος, a horse, + ἀστρον, a star; so called from the star-like mark on the corolla, and in allusion to the popular name knight's-star lily.] A genus of plants, belonging to the natural order Amaryllidaceae, tribe Amarylleae, and type of Kunth's subtribe Hippeastreeae. They have an infundibuliform perianth with a short tube and with the faucial membrane deficient on the lower side, and an irregular limb. The stamens are unequal, declined, and unequally fixed; the ovary is 3-celled; the style 3-lobed or 3-cleft; the leaves are 2-ranked and narrow; the stem is fistulose; the bulbs are tunicate; and the flowers in a 2-to many-flowered umbel. About 50 species are known, natives of North America and the West Indies. They are known in cultivation as the knight's-star lily or equestrian star, many of the species being large and very showy. They comprise most of the plants of hothouses cultivated under the name of Amaryllis. H. aviculare, H. equestre, and H. regium are crimson, scarlet, or orange-red with a green star. H. reticulatum is purplish-red, veined with deeper red, and with a white central star.

hipped¹ (hipt), p. a. [Pp. of *hip*¹, v., 1.] Having the hip sprained or dislocated.

hipped², hypped (hipt), p. a. [Pp. of a verb *hip*², hyp, scarcely used except in this form; cf. *hip*², hyp, n.: see *hip*².] Rendered melancholy; melancholy; mopish. Also spelled hipt and hypt.

It is observable that among the University men [at Cambridge], that almost half of them are Hypt, as they call it: that is, disordered in their brains, sometimes mopish, sometimes wild, the two different effects of the laziness and debauchery.

Dr. J. Edwards [died 1716], in Rep. of Camb. Antiq. (Soc., 1878, p. 130. (Skeat.)

I have been to the last degree hypped since I saw you. Spectator, No. 234.

And from the hipp^d discourses gather That politics go by the weather.

M. Green, The Spleen.

hippelaph (hip'e-laf), n. [NL. hippelaphus, q. v.] Same as hippelaphus.

hippelaphus (hi-pel'ə-fus), n. [NL., < Gr. ἵππελος, lit. 'horse-deer', < ἵππος, horse, + ελαφος, a stag, deer.] The stag of India; the rusa deer: a large animal, supposed to be that described by Aristotle, and now known as Rusa aristotelis or Cervus hippelaphus. See Rusa.

hippety-hoppety (hip'e-ti-hop'e-ti), adv. [A dactylic variation of hip-hop.] Hopping and skipping: used by children: often abbreviated hippety-hop, and in that form used substantively.

Hippia (hip'i-ä), n. [NL., < Gr. ἵππος, a horse (?).] A small genus of branching shrubs, belonging to the natural order Compositæ and tribe Anthemideæ, the type of Lessing's division Hippieæ. They have heterogamous heads, with the outer flowers pistillate, the inner staminate, sterile, and compressed, and slightly winged achenia; heads corymbose at the ends of the branches; flowers all yellow; and leaves alternate, pinnatifid or pinnatisect, rarely entire. The whole plant is odorous. Only 4 species are known, natives of South Africa.

hippian (hip'i-an), a. and n. [< Hippa + -ian.] I. a. Pertaining to the Hippidæ.

II. n. One of the Hippidæ; a burrowing crab or sand-bug.

hippiater (hip-i-ä'ter), n. [< Gr. ἵππιατρος, a farrier, veterinary surgeon, < ἵππος, a horse, + ιατρός, a physician, surgeon, < ἰαθεῖν, heal, cure: see hippiatry.] A farrier; a horse-doctor. Thomas, Med. Dict.

hippiatric (hip-i-ä'trik), a. [< Gr. ἵππιατρικός, pertaining to farriery, < ἵππιατρος, a farrier; see hippiatry.] Pertaining or relating to farriery or veterinary surgery; veterinary.

hippiatry (hip-i-ä'tri), n. [Formerly also hippiatrie; < Gr. ἵππιος, a horse, + ιατρεία, healing, medical treatment; cf. hippiater.] The art of curing diseases of the horse; veterinary surgery.

The horse pulled out his foot; and, which is a wonderful thing in hippiatry, the said horse was thoroughly cured of a ringbone which he had in that foot.

Urquhart, tr. of Rabelais, i. 36.

Hippidæ (hip'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Hippa + -idæ.] A family of anomalous decapod crustaceans, pertaining by the genus Hippa, containing burrowing crabs of an elongate form, with the abdomen fitted for digging and the feet for swimming, and long plumose antennules. The species inhabit shallow water and burrow in sand, rapidly disappearing in it when uncovered. See cut under Hippa.

Hippideæ (hi-pi'dē), n. pl. [NL., < Hippa + -ideæ.] A group of anomalous crustaceans constituted for the families Hippidæ and Albunideæ. They have an ovate carapace and the abdomen composed of six segments (the fifth and sixth fused), the penultimate with a prominent pair of biramous lamellar appendages, and the terminal large.

Hippieæ (hi-pi'ē), n. pl. [NL., < Hippia + -eæ.] A tribe or subtribe of plants of the natural order Compositæ, established by Lessing in 1832, and employed by Grisebach in 1839 as a tribe of Gentianeæ.

hippi, n. Plural of hippius.

hipping-hold, n. [E. dial., also hipping-hawd; < hipping, verbal n. of *hip*³, + hold, n.; lit. a 'hopping-place', i. e. 'stepping-place'.] A place where people stay to chat when they are sent on an errand; a loitering-place. Bailey; Grose.

hippish, hippish (hip'ish), a. [< *hip*², hyp, + -ish.] Hypochondriac; moping.

By cares depress'd, in pensive hippish mood, With slowest pace the tedious minutes roll. Gay, Wine.

I mean to go myself to-morrow Just to divert myself a little space, Because I'm rather hippish.

Byron, Beppo, st. 64.

hippius (hi-pi'us), n.; pl. hippii (-i). [LL., < Gr. ἵππιος, of a horse, equestrian (applied in LG. to a meter regarded as suited to cavalry movements), < ἵππος, a horse: see hippus.] In anc. pros.: (a) An epitrite; a metrical foot consisting of four times or syllables, one of which is short, the other three being long. It is called first (— — —), second (— — —), third (— — —), or fourth (— — —) hippius or epitrite, according as the short is in the first, second, third, or fourth place respectively. See epitrite. (b) A Molossus (— — —); a metrical foot consisting of three long times or syllables. See Molossus.

hippot, n. Same as hypot.

When he's neither in a Passion, nor in the Hippo, nor in Liqueur. Bailey, tr. of Erasmus's Colloquies, I. 248.

Hippobosca (hip-ō-bos'kă), n. [NL., < Gr. ἵπποβόσκος, feeding horses (NL. taken as 'feeding on horses'), < ἵππος, horse, + βόσκειν, feed.] The typical genus of Hippoboscidæ. H. equina is a winged tick-fly of the horse: also forest-fly.

Hippoboscidæ (hip-ō-bos'kî-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Hippobosca + -idæ.] A family of pupiparous dipterous insects, founded by Leach in 1817, containing both winged and wingless forms, which are parasitic upon various birds and quadrupeds, infesting the plumage or pelage; the forest-fies. The species are also known as bird-ticks, sheep-ticks, etc., and one of them is a tick-fly of the horse.

Hippobroma (hip-ō-brō'mă), n. [NL., < Gr. ἵππος, horse, + βρώμα, food.] A genus of plants, of the natural order Lobeliaceæ, the only species of which is H. longiflora, an herbaceous plant, a native of Jamaica and other West Indian islands. It is one of the most poisonous of plants; horses are said to be violently purged after eating it.

hippocamp (hip'ō-kamp), n. [< L. hippocampus: see hippocampus.] Same as hippocampus, 1.

Fair silver-footed Thetis that time threw Along the ocean with a beauteous crew Of her attending sea-nymphs (Jove's bright lamps) Guiding from rocks her chariot's hippocampus.

W. Browne, Britannia's Pastors, il. 1.

hippocampal (hip-ō-kam'pal), a. [< hippocampus + -al.] Of or pertaining to the hippocampus of the brain.—Hippocampal fissure or sulcus, one of the largest and most constant of the fissures or sulci upon the surface of the brain, and corresponding to the elevation known as the hippocampus.—Hippocampal gyrus. See gyrus.

hippocampi, n. Plural of hippocampus.

Hippocampidæ (hip-ō-kam'pî-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Hippocampus + -idæ.] A family of synbranchous fishes, of the order Lophobranchii, typified by the genus Hippocampus; the sea-horses. They have a more or less prehensile finless tail, the head in the typical species set at an angle with the trunk, the snout tubular, and the body mailed as in the pipe-fishes. They are related to the pipe-fishes or Synbranchidæ. The general aspect is strikingly suggestive of the common form given to the knight in chessmen; some species, however, differ little in shape from ordinary pipe-fishes. The general attitude in swimming is erect. The males have a brood-pouch in which the eggs are developed. The sea-horses inhabit the ocean, and especially the warmer seas. The genus Hippocampus, which contains most species of the family, has a wide range, but the other genera are confined to the Pacific ocean.

Hippocampineæ (hip-ō-kam'pî-nē), n. pl. [NL., < Hippocampus + -ineæ.] One of several subfamilies of the family Hippocampidæ, composed of the genera Hippocampus and Acenturus.

hippocampine (hip-ō-kam'pin), a. Pertaining to or having the characters of the Hippocampidæ or Hippocampineæ.

hippocampus (hip-ō-kam'pus), n.; pl. hippocampi (-pî). [L., a sea-horse, < Gr. ἵπποκαμπος, a mythical sea-monster, with horse's body and fish's tail, also in zool. the sea-horse, < ἵππος, horse, + κάμπος, a sea-monster.] 1. In myth., a sea-horse with two fore feet and a body ending in the tail of a dolphin or other fish. The car of Neptune and those of other deities were drawn by such sea-horses. Representations of them are seen in Pompeian paintings, etc. Also hippocamp.

2. [cap.] In zool., the typical genus of sea-horses of the family Hippocampidæ.—3. In anat., a raised curved trace or track on the floor of the lateral ventricle of the brain.—Hippocampus major, or cornu Ammonii, a curved elongated eminence along the whole extent of the floor of the middle or descending horn of the lateral ventricle of the brain.—Hippocampus minor, a longitudinal eminence on the floor of the posterior horn of the lateral ventricle of the brain, expressing the projection into the ventricle of the calcarine sulcus: wrongly supposed to be peculiar to man.—Pes hippocampi, a collateral eminence at the junction of the two hippocampi of the brain, expressing collateral sulci.

Hippocastanaceæ (hip-ō-kas'tā-nă'sē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (De Candoile, 1813), < Hippocastanum + -aceæ.] An order of dicotyledonous polypetalous plants, typified by the genus Æsculus (Hippocastanum). By Bentham and Hooker it was placed in the Sapindaceæ, tribe Sapindæ; by many authors it is regarded as a suborder of Sapindaceæ. It was restored to ordinal rank by Radcliffe in 1888. It comprises trees or shrubs, with opposite or alternate, exstipulate, mostly compound leaves, and showy flowers. The flowers have 5 sepals, usually united into a 5-toothed campanulate or tubular calyx; 5 or 4 unequal, irregular, unguiculate, hypogynous petals; commonly 7 unequal stamens; 1 or more ovules in each cell; and thick and fleshy cotyledons. According to Durand this order includes the genera Æsculus and Bileia, the well-known horse-chestnuts.

Hippocastanum (hip-ō-kas'tā-num), n. [NL., < Gr. ἵππος, a horse, + κάστανος, chestnuts.] A genus of dicotyledonous trees, founded by Tournefort in 1700, and the type of the Hippocastanaceæ. This name, however, is antedated by Linnaeus's name Æsculus, by which the genus is now known. See Æsculus.

hippoccephaloid (hip-ō-sef'ə-lōid), n. [< Gr. ἵππος, a horse, + κεφαλή, head, + εἶδος, form.] A cast of certain fossil equivalent bivalves, especially Trigonia.

hippocras (hip'ō-kras), n. [Formerly also hippocrass, hipocras, ipocras; < F. hippocras, hipocras, a corrupt form repr. NL. hippocraticum (sc. vinum), an artificial name given in allusion to Hippocrates, a famous physician: see Hippocratic.] An old medicinal drink composed of wine with an infusion of spices and other ingredients, used as a cordial. Also hippocrass.

And plaine water hath he preferred before the swete hipocras of the riche men. J. Udall, On Lake vii.

P. Stay, what's best to drink a mornings? R. Ippocras, sir, for my mistress, if I fetch it, is most dear to her. Dekker and Middleton, Honest Whore.

Hippocratea (hip-ō-krā'tē-ä), n. [NL., < Hippocrates, a famous physician: see Hippocratic.] A large genus of polypetalous dicotyledonous climbing shrubs, of the natural order Celastrineæ, and type of the tribe Hippocrateæ. They have a small 5-parted calyx; 5 narrow petals; usually 3 stamens, and a 3-celled ovary which is free or confluent with the disk, ripening into compressed, coriaceous 2-valved or indehiscent carpels, which are slightly connate at the base. The leaves are opposite, petioled, and entire or serrate; the flowers are greenish or white, and arranged in axillary panicles or cymes. About 60 species are known, natives of tropical Asia, Africa, Australia, America, and the Pacific Islands. H. tomosa of the West Indies produces oily seeds which are used like almonds. Well-preserved leaves of two species of Hippocratea have been found in the Miocene deposits of Styria and Bohemia.

hippocread (hip-ō-krā'tē-ad), n. [< Hippocratea.] A plant of the tribe Hippocrateæ. Lindley.

Hippocrateæ (hip-ō-krā'tē-ē), n. pl. [NL., < Hippocratea (< L. Hippocrates: see Hippocratic) + -eæ.] A tribe of plants belonging to the natural order Celastrineæ and typified by the genus Hippocratea. This tribe differs from the others of the Celastrineæ by having 3, rarely 2, 4, or 5, stamens inserted on the disk, and with complanate filaments; the anthers extrorsely dehiscent; the seeds exalbuminous; and the leaves often opposite. It is the same as the Hippocrateæ of Humboldt, Bonpland, and Kunth, and the Hippocrateæ of Jussieu.

Hippocrateæ's sleeve. See sleeve.

Hippocratic (hip-ō-krat'ik), a. [< LL. Hippocraticus, < L. Hippocrates, < Gr. ἵπποκράτης (see def.), the name means 'strong over horses', or 'strong in horse' (cf. ἵπποκρατὺν, be superior in cavalry), < ἵππος, horse, + κράτος, strength.] Of or pertaining to Hippocrates, a Greek physician, born about 460 B. C. and died in the fourth century B. C., called the "father of medicine."—Hippocratic face (facies Hippocratica), the expression which the features assume immediately before death, or in one exhausted by long sickness, great evacuations, or excessive hunger, threatening dissolution: so called from its being vividly described by Hippocrates. The nose is pinched, the eyes are sunken, the temples are hollow, the ears are cold or lead-colored, the skin of the forehead is tense and dry, the complexion is livid, and the lips are pendent, relaxed, and cold.

Sea-horse (Hippocampus hippocampus). (From Report of U. S. Fish Commission, 1864.)

A sighing respiration, feeble and almost imperceptible pulse, the lines of the face hippocratic.

The Century, XXIII. 300.

Hippocratism (hi-pok'ra-tizm), n. [L. Hippocrates (see Hippocratic) + -ism.] The doctrines or system of Hippocrates, who is regarded as the founder of the science of medicine. He avoided the extremes of empiricism and dogmatism, and laid especial stress upon observation and upon attention to regimen and diet.

Hippocrene (hip'ō-kren or hip'ō-kre'nē), n. [L. Hippocrene, < Gr. ἵππος, horse; κρήνη, a fountain: ἵππος, gen. of ἵππος, horse; κρήνη, a fountain.] 1. A spring on Mount Helicon in Boeotia, sacred to the muses, the waters of which are poetically held to possess the power of poetic inspiration.

O for a beaker full of the warm South,
Full of the true, the blithful Hippocrene.

Keats, Ode to a Nightingale.

Nor maddening draughts of Hippocrene, Like gleams of sunshine, flash between Thick leaves of mistle-dew.

Longfellow, Goblet of Life.

2 (hip'ō-kre'nē). [NL.] In zool.: (a) A genus of gastropod mollusks. Oken, 1817. (b) A genus of aculeates. Mertens, 1829.

hippocrepian (hip'ō-kre'pi-an), a. and n. [Gr. ἵππος, a horse, + κρηπίς, a boot (shoe).] 1. a. Like or likened to a horseshoe in shape; hippocrepiform: specifically applied to certain ectoparasitic Polyzoa which usually have the lophophore prolonged into two lobes so as to be horseshoe-shaped, as well as to such a lophophore itself.

The lophophore resembles that of the hippocrepian Phylactolamata in being produced into two arms.

Huxley, Anat. Invert., p. 396.

Some of the scars show traces of the hippocrepian mark characteristic of Protozoa.

Darwin, Geol. Hist. of Plants, p. 94.

II. n. A polyzoan having these characteristics. See Phylactolamata.

hippocrepiform (hip'ō-krep'i-fōrm), a. [Gr. ἵππος, a horse, + κρηπίς, a boot (shoe).] Shaped like a horseshoe.

Hippocrepis (hip'ō-kre'pis), n. [NL., < Gr. ἵππος, horse, + κρηπίς, a boot (shoe).] A small genus of trailing or shrubby perennials, of the natural order Leguminosae, with unequally pinnate leaves, umbellate heads of yellow flowers, which have the stamens free from the vexillum and the anthers uniform, and a sessile, many-ovuled ovary with an inflexed style; natives chiefly of Europe, northern Africa, and western Asia; the horseshoe-vetches. H. comosa, the common horseshoe vetch, is a native of England, and is so named from the shape of its crooked pods.

hippodamē (hip'ō-dām), n. [Misused in Spenser; the form reflects L. Hippodamus, < Gr. ἵππος, horse, + δαμάω, to tame, an epithet of Castor. Spenser was probably thinking of hippocampus, a sea-monster on which the sea-gods rode.] A sea-monster; a sea-horse.

The raging billows . . . made a long broad dyke,
That his [Neptune's] swift chariot might have passage wyde
Which foure great Hippodames did draw in temewise wyde.

Spenser, F. Q., III. xl. 40.

Hippodameian (hip'ō-dā-mē'an), a. [(1) < L. Hippodamia or Hippodameia, also Hippodameia, < Gr. ἵππος, horse, + δαμάω, to tame, a fem. name (see def. 1), corresponding to ἵπποδαμος, Hippodamus; (2) < Gr. ἵπποδαμος, a masc. name: see def., and cf. hippodame.] 1. Of or pertaining to Hippodameia, daughter of Enomaus, and the ancestress of the Atreidae. She became the wife of Pelops as the reward of his victory over her father in a chariot-race, which he won by bribing the charioteer of Enomaus. There are various versions of the legend. 2. Of or pertaining to Hippodamus, a great Milesian architect and engineer of the fifth century B. C.

hippodrome (hip'ō-drōm), n. [F. hippodrome = Sp. hipódromo = Pg. hippodromo = It. ippodromo, < L. hippodromos, < Gr. ἵππος, horse, + δρόμος, a course, running, < δρᾶν, run.] 1. In classical antiquity, a place, more or less embellished by art, in which horse-races and chariot-races were run and horses were exercised: sometimes applied to a modern circus.

In a fine lawn below my house, I have planted an hippodrome; it is a circular plantation, consisting of five walks; the central of which is a horse-course, and three rounds make exactly a mile.

Swift, Account of Monument to the Memory of Dr. Swift. 2. In sporting slang, a race or other athletic contest in which it is arranged beforehand that a certain contestant shall win; a mock or fraudulent race. [U. S.]

hippodrome (hip'ō-drōm), v. i.; pret. and pp. hippodromed, pp. hippodroming. [Gr. hippodrome, n.] To conduct races, equestrian, pedestrian, or aquatic, or other contests, in which the result is prearranged by collusion between the managers and the contestants, in order to make gain through betting, etc.: in allusion to the prearranged or perfunctory races in a hippodrome or circus. [U. S.]

It is a treat to see the whole-souled energy of the young collegians [at foot-ball], and there never has yet been the slur of hippodroming cast upon any college contest.

New York Evening Post, Nov. 4, 1886.

Hippoglossinae (hip'ō-glos-i'nē), n. pl. [NL., < Hippoglossus + -inae.] A subfamily of pleuronectoid fishes, comprising species with a large mouth, well-developed acute teeth, and both the ventrals lateral and nearly equally developed. It comprises the halibut and the large-mouthed flounders of the northern seas.

Hippoglossus (hip'ō-glos'us), n. [NL., < Gr. ἵππος, horse, + γλῶσσα, tongue.] A genus of Pleuronectidae, containing the halibut. The common halibut is H. vulgaris. Cuvier. See cut under halibut. Also written Hypoglossus.

hippogony (hi-pog'ō-ni), n. [Gr. ἵππος, horse, + γονία, production: see -gony.] The pedigree or origin of a horse. Davies. [Rare.]

There was nothing supernatural in Nobis. His hippogony, even if it had been as the Doctor was willing to have it supposed he thought probable, would upon his theory have been in the course of nature, though not in her usual course.

Southey, The Doctor, cxlv.

hippogriff, hippogryph (hip'ō-grif), n. [F. hippogriffe = Sp. hipogrifo = Pg. hipogrifo = It. ippogrifo, < Gr. ἵππος, horse, + LL. gryphus (Gr. γρύψ), a griffin: see griffin.] A fabulous creature, like a griffin, but with hoofs and other parts resembling a horse, apparently invented, in imitation of Pegasus, by the romancers of the middle ages, and furnished to their heroes as a means of transportation through the air.

So saying, he caught him up, and without wing
Of hippogriff, bore through the air sublime.

Milton, P. R., iv. 542.

It reminded me of the Magician Atlantes on his hippogriff, with a knight trussed up behind him.

Scott, Redgauntlet, letter iv.

hippogriffin (hip'ō-grif'in), n. Same as hippogriff.

hippogryph, n. See hippogriff.

hippolith (hip'ō-lith), n. [Gr. ἵππος, horse, + λίθος, stone.] A stone found in the stomach or intestines of a horse. Smart.

hippologist (hi-pol'ō-jist), n. [Gr. hippology + -ist.] One who studies hippology.

Bourgelat, an advocate at Lyons and a talented hippologist, through his influence with Bertin, prime minister under Louis XV., was the first to induce the Government to establish a veterinary school. Encyc. Brit., XXIV. 198.

hippology (hi-pol'ō-jī), n. [Gr. ἵππος, horse, + λογία, < λέγειν, speak: see -ology.] The scientific study of the horse.

The student [in the Leavenworth Cavalry School] is expected to complete a course of Military Art, including . . . field service, equitation, and hippology.

Harper's Mag., LXXVI. 792.

hippomane (hip'ō-mān), n. [F. hippomane = Sp. hipomane = Pg. hippomane = It. ipomane, < L. hippomane, < Gr. ἵππος, horse, + μάνα, an Arcadian plant, appar. of the spurge kind, of which horses were supposed to be madly fond, or which made them mad; also, a small black fleshy substance on the forehead of a new-born foal, or a mucous humor that flows from a mare in heat, used as a philter; < ἵππος, horse, + μάνα, madness, μανέσθαι, be mad.] 1. A substance obtained from a mare or foal, used anciently as a philter or love-charm; hence, a love-potion; a philter or charm. Also hippomane, — 2 (hip'ō-mā-nē). [cap.] [NL.] A genus of plants of the natural order Euphorbiaceae, characterized by having small inconspicuous flowers of separate sexes, borne on long slender spikes. The female flowers are few, and placed singly at the base of the spike; the male flowers are in clusters, occupying the upper part. The male calyx is 2-parted, the female 3-parted; the male contains 2 to 4 stamens joined by thin filaments, the female a many-celled ovary crowned with from 4 to 8 styles. The fruit is a fleshy yellowish-green berry. H. manihoti is the manihot-tree, a native of the West Indies. See manihot.

Hippomaneæ (hip'ō-mā-tē'ā), n. pl. [NL., < Hippomane + -eæ.] A tribe of plants of the natural order Euphorbiaceae, established by Reichenbach in 1828, and typified by the genus Hippomane. It was adopted by Lindley in 1847, who gave it the following characters: ovule solitary, flowers apetalous in spikes, and bracts 1- to many-flowered. Not employed by Bentham and Hooker, who place the genus Hippomane in the tribe Crotonaceæ.

hippomaneæ (hi-pom'ā-nēz), n. Same as hippomane, 1.

The shepherd knows it well, and calls by name

Hippomaneæ to note the mother's flame;

This, gather'd in the planetary hour

With noxious weeds, and spell'd with words of pow'r,

Dire stagemades in the magic bowl infuse.

Dryden, tr. of Virgil's Georgics, iii. 446.

Hipponactean (hip'ō-nak-tē'an), a. and n. [LL. hipponacteus, < Gr. ἵππονακτεῖος (as n. τὸ ἵππονακτεῖον, sc. μέτρον), pertaining to Hipponax, < ἵππον (ἵππος) + νακτεῖος (-νακτ-), a Greek poet, lit. 'horse-ruler', < ἵππος, horse, + νακτεῖος, ruler, king.] 1. Of or pertaining to Hipponax of Ephesus (sixth century B. C.), a Greek writer of iambic poetry, who was celebrated for his invective poems. — 2. In anc. pros., an epithet noting certain meters invented or introduced into Greek literature by Hipponax. — Hipponactean distich, Hipponactean system, a distich consisting of a trochaic dimeter and an iambic trimeter, both catalectic. — Hipponactean meter, Hipponactean verse. (a) A trochaic tetrameter catalectic, the next to the last time or syllable of which is long instead of short (— — — — —). (b) Called on account of this intentional violation of rhythm scæzon (halting or limping). See scæzon.

(c) An iambic trimeter catalectic, of the kind called scæzon and choliambus (literally, lame iambus), because the next to the last time or syllable is long instead of being short, as required by rhythm (thus, — — — — — | — — — — —).

II. n. In anc. pros., a Hipponactean meter or verse.

hipponosology (hip'ō-nō-sol'ō-jī), n. [Gr. ἵππος, horse, + E. nosology, q. v.] Hippopathology.

hippopathological (hip'ō-path-ō-loj'i-kal), a. Pertaining to hippopathology.

hippopathology (hip'ō-pā-thol'ō-jī), n. [Gr. ἵππος, horse, + E. pathology, q. v.] The pathology of the horse; the science of veterinary medicine.

Hippophaë (hi-pof'ā-ē), n. [NL., < L. hippophaë, < Gr. ἵππος, horse, + φαεινός, shining (or φάειν, produce). The allusion is not clear.] A monotypic genus of shrubby plants, of the natural order Elæagnaceæ, confined to temperate Europe and Asia; the swallow-thorns. H. rhamnoides (the common swallow-thorn or sea-buck-thorn), the only species, growing on the coasts and Alpine rivers of Europe, is a thorny shrub, preferring a sandy soil, but sometimes found on cliffs near the sea. It is occasionally cultivated in gardens, on account of its silvery leaves, which are linear-lanceolate. The berries, which are produced in great abundance, are yellow, contain one seed, and have an acid flavor. A fish-sauce is sometimes prepared from them, and the Tatars are said to make a jelly from them. Leaves and fruit of two extinct species of Hippophaë have been found in a fossil state in the Miocene lignites of Hesse at Salzhausen.

hippophagi (hi-pof'ā-jī), n. pl. [ML., pl. of hippophagus: see hippophagous.] Eaters of horse-flesh; specifically, a name given by Ptolemy to certain nomads, Scythians in central Asia and Sarmatians northeast of the Caspian sea, who fed on horse-flesh.

hippophagist (hi-pof'ā-jist), n. [Gr. hippophagy + -ist.] One who eats horse-flesh.

hippophagous (hi-pof'ā-gus), a. [ML. hippophagus (in pl. hippophagi, q. v.), < Gr. ἵππος, horse, + φαίω, eat.] Feeding on horse-flesh.

hippophagy (hi-pof'ā-jī), n. [= F. hippophagie; as hippophagous + -y.] The act or practice of feeding on horse-flesh.

hippophile (hip'ō-fīl), n. [Gr. ἵππος, horse, + φίλος, loving.] A horse-lover; one who is addicted to horses; a horse-fancier.

Next to impossible to find a perfectly honest hippophile.
O. W. Holmes, The Atlantic, LIX, 534.

Hippopodiidae (hip'-pō-dī'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Hippopodius + -idae.] A family of oceanic hydroids, tubular medusans, or Siphonophora, of the order Calycephora, taking name from the genus Hippopodius, and related to Diphyidae, but having more than two horseshoe-shaped swimming-bells, no polyp-stem, and no float. Also written Hippopodiæ.

Hippopodiidae: the swimming column has two rows of neotocyles, and is situated on an upper lateral branch of the stem. The male and female gonophores are grouped in clusters . . . at the base of the nutritive polype.

Clavis, Zoology (trans.), I, 250.

Hippopodius (hip'-pō-dī-us), n. [NL., < Gr. ἵππος, horse, + ποδῖς (pod-) = E. foot.] A genus of tubular medusans or calycephorans, giving name to the family Hippopodiidae: same as Gleba, 2. Quoy and Gaimard, 1827.

hippopotami, n. Latin plural of hippopotamus.
hippopotamid (hip'-pōt'-a-mīd), a. [< hippopotamus + -ic.] Of or pertaining to the hippopotamus; hence, figuratively, ponderous.

Even with the masters of it, English prose was then still in the hippopotamus stage. Harper's Mag., LXXVII, 477.

hippopotamid (hip'-pōt'-a-mīd), n. One of the Hippopotamidae.

Huxley, Anat. Vert., p. 320.

Hippopotamidae (hip'-pō-tam'-i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Hippopotamus + -idae.] A family of omnivorous mammals, of the order Ungulata, suborder Artiodactyla, series Omnivora, and superfamily Hippopotamoidae; the hippopotamuses. The technical characteristics are: the lower canines enlarged and tusk-like, the stomach non-ruminant, only imperfectly septe, the odontoid process of the axis conical, the body massive and obese, the feet 4-toed and phalangate, the muzzle obtuse with superolateral nostrils, and the mammary teat in number and inguinal. The family is intermediate between swine and deer, but is much nearer the former; it is divided into Hippopotamini and Choropithecini.

Hippopotamini (hip'-pōt'-a-mī-nē), n. pl. [NL., < Hippopotamus + -ini.] The typical subfamily of Hippopotamidae, distinguished from Choropithecini by the depression of the skull and the prominence of the completed bony orbits. The only recent genus is Hippopotamus; a fossil genus is Hezaprotodon.

hippopotamine (hip'-pōt'-a-mīn), a. [< hippopotamus + -ine.] Of or pertaining to the hippopotamus; having the characters of the Hippopotamidae.

Hippopotamoidae (hip'-pōt'-a-moi'-dē-ā), n. pl. [NL., < Hippopotamus + -oidea.] A superfamily of mammals, containing only the Hippopotamidae. T. N. Gill, 1872.

hippopotamus (hip'-pōt'-a-mus), n.; pl. hippopotamuses, hippopotami (-ez, -mī). [In earlier form contr. hippotame, q. v.; = F. hippotame = Sp. hippotamo = Pg. hippotamo = It. ippopotamo, < L. hippopotamus, < Gr. ἵπποπόταμος, a river-horse, an irreg. formation arising from the earlier phrase name ἵππος ποτάμιος, where ποτάμιος is an adj. (< ποταμός, river), qualifying ἵππος, horse. Another name was ὀπίκος τοῦ Νείλου, 'the horse of the Nile.'] 1. An omnivorous ungulate pachydermatous mammal of the genus Hippopotamus or family Hippopotamidae. The best-known species is the living African river-horse, H. amphibius. It has a thick and square head, a very large muzzle, small eyes and ears, thick and heavy body, short legs terminated by four toes, a short tail, it attains a length of about 14 feet, rarely more, and stands about 5 feet high. It delights in water, living in lakes, rivers, and estuaries, and feeding on water-plants, or on the herbage growing near the water. It is an excellent swimmer and diver, and can remain under water a considerable time. A much smaller and very different hippopotamus is Choropsis liberiensis. See Choropsinae. There are several extinct species, of various genera.

The same river Nilus bringeth forth another beast called hippopotamus, i. e., a river horse.

Holland, tr. of Pliny, viii, 25.

2. [cap.] [NL.] The typical genus of Hippopotamidae, characterized by the presence of only four lower incisors. H. amphibius is the only living species.—Tailless hippopotamus, the giant cavy or capibara.

Hippopus (hip'-ō-pus), n. [NL., < Gr. ἵππος, horse, + ποῖς (pod-) = E. foot.] 1. A genus of siphonate bivalve mollusks, of the family Tridacnidae, or giant clams, and very near Tridacna.

Bear's-paw Clam (Hippopus maculatus).

daena itself, having closed valves, two cardinal teeth, and a small byssus. H. maculatus of the Indian ocean is known as the bear's-paw clam. Martini, 1773; Lamarck, 1799.—2. A genus of aculephs: usually misspelled Hippopas. Delle Chiaie, 1838.

hippo-sandal (hip'-ō-san'-dal), n. [< Gr. ἵππος, horse, + σάνδαλον, sandal.] See the extract.

There are, however, some singular articles termed hippo-sandals, the use of which appears doubtful, but which were either attached to the horses' feet, or to a primitive kind of cart without wheels.

Jour. of Anthropol. Inst., XVIII, 202.

Hippospongia (hip'-ō-spon'-ji-ā), n. [NL., < Gr. ἵππος, horse, + σπογγα, σπόγγος, a sponge: see sponge.] The genus of horny or fibrous sponges which contains the common bath-sponge or horse-sponge, H. equina. It is characterized by the thinness of its fibers and the labyrinthine character of the choanosome, in consequence of which the chief fibers have no regular radiate arrangement.

hippoteology (hi-pos-tē-ō'-jī), n. [< Gr. ἵππος, horse, + E. osteology.] The osteology of the horse.

hippotame, n. [ME. corruptly ipotayne; < OF. hippotame = OIt. ippotamo, < L. hippopotamus, a hippopotamus: see hippopotamus.] A hippopotamus.

In that Contree ben many Ipotaynes, that dwellen sometime in the Watre, and somtyme on the Lond; and thei ben half Man and half Hors, as I have seyd before; and thei eten men, when thei may take hem.

Mandeville, Travels, p. 283.

The hippotame that like an horse doth neigh.
John Denny's (Arber's Eng. Garner, I, 166).

Hippotherium (hip'-ō-thē'-ri-um), n. [NL., < Gr. ἵππος, horse, + θήριον, a wild beast.] A genus of fossil horses: a synonym of Hipparion. Kaup.

hippogris (hip'-ō-ti'-grī), n. [Gr. ἵππογρύς, a (supposed) kind of tiger, < ἵππος, horse, + γρύς, tiger.] 1. A classic name of the ass, from the stripes on the back and withers.—2. [cap.] [NL.] A genus of striped African equids, containing the zebra, dauw, and quagga. Hamilton Smith.

hippocomical (hip'-ō-tom'-i-kal), a. [< hippocomy + -ic.] Pertaining to hippocomy.

hippocomist (hi-pot'-ō-mīst), n. [< hippocomy + -ist.] One who dissects horses, or is versed in the anatomy of the horse.

hippomoty (hi-pot'-ō-mī), n. [< Gr. ἵππος, a horse, + τομή, a cutting.] The dissection of horses; the anatomy of the horse.

Hippotraginae (hip'-ō-trā'-jī-nē), n. pl. [NL., < Hippotragus + -inae.] A subfamily of equine antelopes, of which the genus Hippotragus is the type.

Hippotragus (hi-pot'-rā-gus), n. [NL., < Gr. ἵππος, horse, + τράγος, goat.] A genus of antelopes, typical of the subfamily Hippotraginae, containing the African equine and sable antelopes, H. equinus and H. niger: synonymous with Agocerus. 2. The addax is sometimes misplaced in this genus. Sundevall.

Hipp's chronoscope. See chronoscope.

hippurate (hip'-ū-rāt), n. [< hippuric + -ate.] A compound formed by the union of hippuric acid with a base.

hippuria (hi-pū'-ri-ā), n. [NL., < hippuric + -ia.] In pathol., the presence of an excessive amount of hippuric acid in the urine.

hippuric (hi-pū'-rik), a. [< Gr. ἵππος, horse, + οὖρον, urine, + -ic.] Relating to or obtained from the urine of horses.—Hippuric acid, $\text{C}_8\text{H}_9\text{NO}_3$, an acid found in considerable quantity in the urine of herbivorous animals and in that of persons suffering from diabetes. It crystallizes in long needles, is soluble in warm water, and when heated with a strong acid breaks up into benzoic acid and glycolic.

hippurid (hip'-ū-rid), n. A plant of the natural order Haloragaceae (Hippuridaceae of Link.). Lindley.

Hippuridæ (hip'-ū-rid'-ē-ā), n. pl. [NL., < Hippuris (-rid-) + -æ.] An order of plants established by Link in 1821: same as the Haloragaceae of Endlicher, 1836.

Hippuris (hi-pū'-ris), n. [L., < Gr. ἵππουρις, horse-tailed; as noun, a plant, mare's-tail; < ἵππος, horse, + οὐρά, tail.] 1. A genus of marsh or aquatic plants, of the natural order Haloragaceae; the mare's-tails. It is characterized by having perfect or polygamous flowers, an entire calyx, no petals, a single stamen inserted on the edge of the calyx, and a single thread-shaped style, stigmatic down one side, and received in the groove between the lobes of the anther; the fruit is nut-like, 1-celled, and 1-seeded. H. vulgaris, the mare's-tail or bottle-brush, grows in pools and marshes throughout the temperate and cold regions of the globe. It is an erect herb, with crowded whorls of narrow hair-like leaves (whence the name), and conspicuous flowers, which are also whorled. It has astringent properties, and is popularly used in diarrhea and hemorrhage.

2. In zool., a genus of fishes. Klein, 1749.—3. [l. c.] In anat., the leash of nerves in which the spinal cord ends; the cauda equina, or horsetail.

hippurite (hip'-ū-rit), n. and a. [< NL. Hippurites, q. v.] 1. A specimen or species of the family Hippuritidae; one of the Rudistes; a horsetail. Hippurites were formerly classed by Lamarck and Latreille with belemnites, etc., as being cephalopods.—2. A kind of fossil cup-coral, Cyathophyllum ceratites of Goldfuss.

II. a. 1. Pertaining to or having the characters of the Hippuritidae.—2. Same as hippuritic.

Hippurites (hip'-ū-rit'-ēz), n. [NL., < Gr. ἵππουρις, horse-tailed (see Hippuris), + -ites.] 1. The typical genus of Hippuritidae. Lamarck, 1801.—2. In bot., a generic name given by Lindley and Hutton (1833-5) to remains of a fossil plant found in the coal-measures of England. The name Hippurites was given to it because (as the authors of the genus remark) it resembles Hypuris "as much as it can be said to resemble anything now living." In accordance with the latest investigations, Hippurites is united with Calamocladus, a genus of the Equisetaceae.

hippuritic (hip'-ū-rit'-ik), a. [< hippurite + -ic.] Pertaining to hippurites; abounding in, characterized by, or containing hippurites, as certain cretaceous formations.

Hippuritic limestone had not been noticed on the eastern frontier. Encyc. Brit., XVIII, 622.

hippuritid (hi-pū'-ri-tid), n. A bivalve mollusk of the family Hippuritidae.

Hippuritidæ (hip'-ū-rit'-i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Hippurites + -idae.] A family of fossil bivalve mollusks, of the order Rudistes, named from the genus Hippurites; the hippurites or horsetails. As generally accepted, it includes all the species of the order. They have shells with very unequal valves, fixed by one valve, and composed of two layers; the free valve has an internal layer perforated by canals, and an outer porous one; the attached valve has an internal lacunar layer and an outer layer grooved with vascular impressions. The species are characteristic of the Cretaceous epoch, and exhibit considerable diversity. The family is also limited by some to the genus Hippurites and closely related forms.

hippuritoid (hi-pū'-ri-toid), a. Pertaining to or resembling the Hippuritidae.

hippus (hip'-us), n. [NL., < Gr. ἵππος (m. and f.), dial. ἵκος = L. equus = AS. eoh, etc., a horse: see Equus.] In pathol., an affection of the eyes; clonic spasm of the iris.

hip-rafter (hip'-rāf'-tēr), n. Same as angler-rafters. See hip, 4.—Back of a hip-rafter. See back.

hip-roof (hip'-rōf), n. A roof the ends of which rise immediately from the wall-plates with the same inclination to the horizon as its other two sides. Also called hipped roof. See cut on following page.

hip-rose (hip'-rōz), n. Same as hip-brier.
hip-shot (hip'-shot), a. Having the hip dislocated or shot out of place; hence, figuratively, lame; awkward.

Why do you go nodding and wagging so like a fool, as if you were hip-shot? says the goose to the gosling.

Str R. L. Estrange.

two teats, skin about two inches thick on the back and sides, and no hair except at the extremity of the tail. The incisors and canines of the lower jaw are of great size and strength, the canines or tusks being long and curved forward. These tusks sometimes reach the length of two feet and more, and weigh upward of six pounds. It is chiefly on account of the tusks and teeth that the animal is killed, they being superior in hardness to ivory, and less liable to turn yellow. This hippopotamus inhabits nearly the whole of Africa; its flesh is eaten by the nahirmologion (hir-mō-lō'gi-on), n.; pl. hirmologia (-ā). [< MGr. εἰρηολόγιον, εἰρηολόγιον, a collection of hirmoi, < εἰρμός, hirmos, + λογίον, < λέγειν, say. In the Gr. Ch., an office-book containing the hirmoi, usually also the prayers at the elevation of the panagia (see panagia), and some other forms.

hirmos, hirmus (hír'mos, hér'mus), n.; pl. hirmoi, hirmi (-mōi, -mī). [LL. hirmos, < Gr. εἰρμός, a series, connection, context, in LGr., etc., used specifically as in def. (the exact reason being uncertain); < εἰπεω = L. serere, fasten together, join: see series and sermon, from the L. verb.] In the hymnology of the Greek Church, the first strophe or stanza of a standard or original ode in a canon of odes, serving as a rhythmical and musical model for the other stanzas (troparia), both of its own ode and of others in the same rhythm. In the office-books it is inclosed in inverted commas, and is given in full only at the head of its own ode, the initial words alone being prefixed to other odes. A hirmos is sometimes said at the end of its ode.

hirondelle (hir-on-del'), n. [F., a swallow, dim., < L. hirundo, a swallow: see hirundo.] In her., a swallow used as a bearing.

The swallow, or hirondelle, forms the very early coat of the Arundels. Encyc. Brit., XI. 701.

hirple (hēr'pl), v. i.; pret. and pp. hirpled, ppr. hirpling. [Origin obscure.] To halt; walk as if lame. [Scotch.]

The hares were hirplin down the furs (furrows). Burns, Holy Fair.

His aged grandmother was wont to hirple out to the Lindsaylands road to meet him on his way home. Quoted in Dr. J. Brown's Spare Hours, 3d ser., p. 333.

hirse (hērs), n. [Also written hyrse; = Dan. hirse = Sw. hirs, < G. hirse, hirsche, MHG. hirse, hirs, OHG. hirs, hirs, millet; origin obscure.] The broom-corn, Sorghum saccharatum or S. campanum, sometimes called millet or Indian millet.

hirsēl (hír'sel), n. [Sec.; also written hirsle, hirsell, hirsale, hirsell (the last appear in simulation of hird, herd); origin uncertain.] 1. A multitude; a throng: applied to living creatures of any kind. [Scotch.]

"Jock, man," said he, "ye're just telling a hirsēl o' endown leas [lies]." Hogg, Brownie, I. 160.

Specifically—2. A flock of sheep. [Scotch.]

Come from the hills where your hirsēls are grazing. Scott, March, March.

hirsēl (hēr'sl), v. i.; pret. and pp. hirsēled or hirsēlled, ppr. hirsēling or hirsēlling. [Sec.; also written hirsle; origin obscure.] To slide or move by pushing one's self along on the back or haunches; also, to move forward with a rustling noise along a rough surface. [Scotch.]

So he sat himself down and hirsēlled down into the glen, where it had hae been ill following him wif the best. Scott, Guy Mannering, xxv.

hirsēlvet, pron. A Middle English form of herself. Chaucer.

hirst (hērst), n. A former spelling of hirst. hirsute (hēr-sūt'), a. [= F. hirsute = Sp. Pg. hirsuto = It. irsuto, < L. hirsutus, rough, shaggy, bristly; cf. hirtus, rough, hairy, shaggy; perhaps ult. akin to horrere, bristle: see horrent, horrid.] 1. Hairy; shaggy.

Suppose thou saw her in a baggy beggar's weed, or else dressed in some old hirsute attires out of fashion. Burton, Anat. of Mel., p. 554.

Wearing his hair and beard unshorn, according to ancient Batavian custom, until the death of his relative, Egmont, should have been expiated. . . . this hirsute and savage corsair seemed an embodiment of vengeance. Motley, Dutch Republic, II. 350.

2. Specifically, in zoöl. and bot., rough or bristling with hairs; having a thick covering of long and rather stiff hairs.—3. Coarse; boorish; unmanly.

He looked elderly, was cynical and hirsute in his behaviour. Life of A. Wood, p. 109.

hirsuteness (hēr-sūt'nes), n. The state of being hirsute; hairiness.

Leanness, hirsuteness, broad veins, much hair on the brow, &c., show melancholy. Burton, Anat. of Mel., p. 59.

hirsuties (hēr-sū'ti-ēz), n. [NL., < L. hirsutus, hairy: see hirsute.] In entom., a thick covering of coarse or fine hairs.

hirsutocinereous (hēr-sū'tō-si-nē'rē-us), a. [< L. hirsutus, hairy, + cinereus, ashy.] In entom., hirsute with cinereous hairs. This and similar compounds, as hirsuto-atrous, hirsutocastaneous, etc., indicate color arising from the hairy covering, and not from the integument.

hirtellous (hēr-tel'us), a. Minutely hirsute. Hirudinacea (hi-rō-di-nā'sē-ā), n. pl. [NL. (Grube), < Hirudo (-din-) + -acea.] A primary division or "tribe" of leeches, characterized by the non-protrusile proboscis, and comprising most of the order Hirudinea.

Hirudinea (hir-ō-din'ē-ā), n. pl. [NL., < Hirudo (-din-) + -ea.] An order of annelids having a sucking-disk at one or both ends; the leeches or suctorial annelids. They are hermaphrodite and ametabolous, mostly aquatic and found in fresh water, but sometimes marine or terrestrial, with only superficial annulation, and not chetiferous. There are several families, as Acanthobdellidae, Malacoobdellidae, Branchiobdellidae, Gnathobdellidae. The group is also called Hirudina, Hirudines, Hirudines, as well as Discophora, Suctorina, and Bellidoidea. The Hirudinea are sometimes raised to the rank of a class, ranged with Cestodea, Trematoidea, and the turbellarians under a phylum Platyhelminia, and divided into two orders, Rhynchobdella and Gnathobdella.

hirudinid (hi-rō'di-nid), n. A leech of the family Hirudinidae.

Hirudinidae (hir-ō-din'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Hirudo (-din-) + -idae.] A family of leeches, named from the genus Hirudo. The oral sucker is incomplete, continuous with the body, and formed by a molding of the anterior rings; the gullet is short, and the anus very small. "Cutting into the skin, they suck the blood of vertebrate animals, and only fall away when gorged. The alimentary canal is deeply incised and lobed, with the hinder part of lobes elongated in an intestinal manner. In these the blood will often remain for days and weeks undigested." (G. Johnston, 1865.) Also called Gnathobdellidae.

Hirudo (hi-rō'dō), n. [L., a leech, also called sanguisuga.] A representative genus of leeches, giving name to the family Hirudinidae and order Hirudinea. H. medicinalis or officinalis is the common medical leech, now usually referred to a family called Gnathobdellidae. See leech.

hirundine (hi-run'din), a. and n. [L. hirundineus, of the swallow, < hirundo, a swallow: see Hirundo.] 1. a. Of or pertaining to the swallow; swallow-like; specifically, pertaining to the Hirundinidae.

II. n. A swallow; one of the Hirundinidae.

Hirundinidae (hir-un-din'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Hirundo (-din-) + -idae.] A family of fissirostral oscine passerine birds; the swallows. They have 9 primaries, a short, flat, wide, deeply cleft bill, long pointed wings, a diversified tail, usually forked or emarginate, small feet, and a lithe slender body. There are about 100 species of the family, divided into numerous modern genera, all insectivorous, migratory, and great flyers. Leading genera are Hirundo, Chelidon, Petrochelidon, Cisticola, Stelgidopteryx, Atticora, and Progne. See swallow, martin.

Hirundo (hi-run'dō), n. [L. = Gr. χελιδών, a swallow.] A genus of swallows, typical of the family Hirundinidae. The tail is deeply forked, with attenuated lateral feathers about as long as the wings; the upper parts are glossy and dark, and the lower rufous with a pectoral collar; the sexes are similar; and the eggs are colored. The barn-swallows now compose this genus, such as H. rustica of Europe and H. erythrogastra of America; but it was formerly more than continentous with the family Hirundinidae. See cut under barn-swallow.

his (hiz), pron. The possessive (genitive) masculine (and formerly also neuter) of he.

his (hiz), pron. [ME. his, rare in this use.] A perverted form of the genitive inflection -s, 2s, Middle English and early modern English -es, -is (see -es and -is), which was confused with the genitive pronoun his, and became common especially after nouns whose nominatives end in -s. This use was very frequent in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, particularly after Greek and Latin names in -es or -us, as Artaxerxes his crown, Brutus his virtue, etc. The use came to be recognized as erroneous, and died out in the first half of the eighteenth century.

Inne was the vorreste mon The Peteres peni bigon. Layamon (A), iii. 255.

Ine was the forste man That Peter his peny bigan. Layamon (B), iii. 255.

William Holloway by Gode is sufferne Priour. . . . When the saide pastures were in the lorde is handes, etc. Document (1525), quoted in Earle's Phil. Eng. Tongue, [p. 529].

The Cathedral Church of Christe in Oxford of King Henry theight (the Eight) his founda'con.

John Haryngton, Assignment (1594), quoted in Earle's (Phil. Eng. Tongue, p. 529).

Nor Mars his sword nor war's quick fire shall burn The living record of your memory. Shak., Sonnets, IV.

The statue of Hersilia, Romulus his wife, is made in brass. Coryat, Crudities, I. 86.

My paper is the Ulysses his bow, in which every man of wit or learning may try his strength.

Addison, Guardian, No. 98.

By young Telemachus his blooming years. Pope, Odyssey.

Sarah her name is changed. Gen. xvii., Contents.

By Ronix her womanish subtlety. Drayton, Polyolbon.

About the lawfulness of the Hollanders their throwing off the monarchy of Spain. Welwood, Memoirs.

hish (hish), v. i. [< ME. hisshen, var. of hissen, hiss; cf. hush, 'sh, etc.] To hiss; make a sibilant sound by expelling the breath forcibly through the closed teeth.

The clear truth so manifestly proved that they cannot once hish against it. Tyndale, Works, I. 432.

Mumps [a dog] knows his company—he does. I might hish at him by th' hour together before he'd fly at a real gentlewoman like you. George Eliot, Mill on the Floss, v. 2.

hisingerite (his'ing-er-it), n. [Named after W. Hisinger (1766–1852), a Swedish chemist and mineralogist.] A hydrous iron silicate, occurring in amorphous compact masses of a black to brownish-black color and conchoidal fracture, in various localities of Scandinavia.

hisen (hizn), pron. [Also written his'n; a popular formation, like hern, urn, yourn, theirn, etc., not, as sometimes explained, a contraction of his own, etc., but in imitation of mine, thine, etc., with formative -n.] Same as his in its predicate use. [Prov. Eng. and U. S.]

An' every feller felt ez though all Mexico wuz his'n. Lowell, Biglow Papers, I. 21.

Hispa (his'pā), n. [NL., abbr. < L. hispidus, hairy, bristly: see hispid.] The typical genus of chrysomelid beetles of the subfamily Hispine. The front is inflexed; the mouth is on the under side of the head, which is not covered by the thorax; the sides of the elytra and thorax are not expanded, and their upper surface is armed with long spines, whence the name. H. atra, occurring over a large part of Europe, is about 5 millimeters long, of a black color, and has the spines of the elytra disposed in 4 more or less regular rows.

Hispanic (his-pan'ik), a. [< L. Hispanicus, Spanish, < Hispania, Spain: see Spanish.] Pertaining to Spain or its people; particularly, pertaining to ancient Spain (Hispania).

Hispanicism (his-pan'i-sizm), n. [< Hispania + -ism.] A Spanish phrase or idiom.

There are likewise numerous hispanicisms. Keightley.

Temple had . . . gradually formed a style singularly lucid and melodious, superficially deformed indeed by gallicisms and hispanicisms picked up in travel or in negotiation, but at the bottom pure English. Macaulay, Sir William Temple.

Hispanicize (his-pan'i-siz), v. t.; pret. and pp. Hispanicized, ppr. Hispanicizing. [< Hispania + -ize.] To render Spanish in character.

Several [tribes] have totally disappeared as separate unities; others have been in large measure Hispanicized both in language and in habits. Encyc. Brit., VI. 165.

Hispaniolate (his-pan'i-ō-lāt), v. t.; pret. and pp. Hispaniolated, ppr. Hispaniolating. [After Sp. españolado, pp. of españolhar, make Spanish, < Español, Spanish, < España, < L. Hispania, Spain.] Same as Hispaniolize.

The Hispaniolated counsellors of Duke John. Motley, United Netherlands, III. 454.

Hispaniolize (his-pan'i-ō-liz), v. t.; pret. and pp. Hispaniolized, ppr. Hispaniolizing. [After Sp. españolhar, < Español, Spanish: see Hispaniolate.] To imbue with Spanish sentiments.

He had . . . become Hispaniolized under the . . . treatment of the King and the Jesuits. Motley, United Netherlands, I. 15.

Hispano-Gallican (his-pan'ō-gal'i-kan), a. [< L. Hispanicus, Hispanic, Spanish, + Gallicus, Gallic, French.] Belonging in common to Hispania, or Spain, and Gaul, or France.—Hispano-Gallican group or family (of liturgies). See Gallican liturgies, under Gallican.

hispid (his'pid), a. [= F. hispide = Sp. hispido = Pg. hispido = It. ispidio, < L. hispidus, rough, shaggy, hairy, bristly.] From the same ult. source, E. hideous, hideous, q. v.] Hairy; rough; shaggy; bristly.

John of the wilderness? the hairy child? The hispid Thebites? or what staid wild? Morse, Verses. Preface to Hall's Poems (1646).

Specifically—(a) In bot., having strong hairs or bristles; beset with stiff bristles. (b) In entom., closely covered with small angular prominences; rough with minute spines or very rigid bristles.

Hispidæ (his'pi-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Hispa + -idae.] The leaf-beetles, Hispina, rated as a family.

hispidating (his'pi-dā-ting), a. [< hispid + -ate + -ing.] Bristling. Sollas.

hispidity (his-pid'i-ti), n. [< hispid + -ity.] The state of being hispid.

The hispidity or hairiness of his skin. Dr. H. Morse, Mystery of Godliness, III. vi. § 5.

hispidulous (his-pid'ū-lus), a. [*< NL. hispidulus, dim. of L. hispidus, hairy: see hispid.] In bot., having short stiff hairs.

Hispa atra, natural size.

Hispiñæ (his-pi-nē), n. pl. [NL., < Hispa + -inæ.] A subfamily of Chrysomelidae, typified by the genus Hispa, containing numerous genera and species whose larvae mine the leaves of various plants, and are popularly known as leaf-beetles. See cut under Hispa.

hiss (his), v. [ME. hissen, hyssen, rarely hishsen (< E. dial. hish), < AS. hysian (rare) = LG. hissen, < hissen = OD. hisschen = Dan. hysse = Sw. hys-sa, hiss: cf. hush, hist, hizz, also fizz, sizzle (D. sisen, G. zischen, etc.), whizz, whistle, etc.; all ult. imitative of sibilant.] 1. intr. 1. To make or emit a sound like a prolonged enunciation of s, as a serpent or a goose; utter or send forth a long-drawn sibilant; hence, to emit any similar sound, as water thrown on hot metal, or as steam rushing through a small orifice; specifically (of persons), to express disapprobation or contempt by uttering such a sound. The merchants among the people shall hiss at thee. Ezek. xxvii. 36. When roasted crabs hiss in the bowl, Then nightly sings the staring owl. Shak., L. L. L., v. 2 (song). I do feel the brand Hissing already at my forehead; now Mine ears are boring. B. Jonson, Volpone, iii. 6. Hiss, snake—I saw him there— Let the fox bark, let the wolf yell. Tennyson, Pellens and Ettarre.

2. To whizz, as an arrow or other thing in rapid flight.

Burning Balls hiss harmless by.

Congreve, Taking of Namure.

The spear

Hiss'd and went quivering down into the sand, Which it sent flying wide.

M. Arnold, Sohrab and Rustum.

II. trans. To condemn or express disapproval of by hissing.

Mal. What's the newest grief? Rosse. That of an hour's age doth hiss the speaker; Each minute teems a new one. Shak., Macbeth, iv. 3. You'll utterly spoil our play, and make it to be hissed.

Beau, and Fl., Knight of Burning Pestle, iii. 3. Such Work by Hirling Actors shou'd be done, Whom you may Clap or Hiss for half a Crown.

Prior, To the Orphan.

hiss (his), n. [cf. hiss, v.] A continued sound like that of s; a prolonged sibilant produced by the organs of utterance, or any similar sound: as, a serpent's hiss. It is a common expression of disapprobation or contempt.

He would have spoke, But hiss for hiss return'd with forked tongue To forked tongue. Milton, P. L., x. 518.

Thus was the applause they meant Turn'd to exploding hiss, triumph to shame Cast on themselves from their own mouths. Milton, P. L., x. 546.

The hot hiss

And bustling whistle of the youth who scour'd His master's armour. Tennyson, Geraint.

hiss (his'er), n. One who or that which hisses.

Begone, then, take flight, thou venomous hiss, thou lying worm. Pop. Sci. Mo., XXXIV. 442.

hissing (his'ing), n. [cf. ME. hissing, hyssing, rarely hissing; verbal n. of hiss, v.] 1. A hiss.

Therefore thei speke not, but thei maken a maner of hiss-ynge, as a Nedre dothe. Mandeville, Travels, p. 205.

I heard a hissing: there are serpents here!

Goldsmith, Prologue to Zobeide.

2. An occasion of contempt; an object of scorn and derision.

I will make this city desolate, and an hissing. Jer. xix. 8.

Has he all that the world loves and admires and covets?—he must cast behind him their admiration . . . and become a byword and a hissing. Emerson, Compensation.

hist (hist), interj. [Formerly also ist; a more substantial form of 'st, as hish, hush, of 'sh: see 'st, 'sh, and hish, hush, whist, etc.] A sibilant utterance used to attract attention and command or suggest silence.

Hist! 'st, 'st, hark! Why, there's a cadence able to ravish the dullest staid. A. Brewer (?), Lingua, iii. 7.

Houische (an interjection whereby silence is imposed), hush, whist, ist, not a word for your life. Cotgrave.

The knight whispered me, "Hist, these are lovers." Steele, Spectator, No. 118.

hist (hist), v. t. [cf. hist, interj. Cf. hish, v.] To incite, as a dog, by making a sibilant sound.

Let thy should be out, or faint, or cold.

Their innocent children hist them on with gold.

Middleton, Father Hubbard's Tales.

[In the following passage hist is apparently the imperative of the verb, but it is peculiarly used, perhaps like whist as used also by Milton as an apparent past participle ("the winds with wonder whist").]

But first and chiefest with thee bring . . .

The Cherub Contemplation,

And the mute Silence hist along. Milton, Il Penseroso, l. 55.]

hist (hist), v. and n. A common dialectal form of hoist.

hist. An abbreviation of history, historical.

Hister (his'ter), n. [NL., < hister, orig. (Etruscan) form of L. histrio, a stage-player: see histrio.] The typical genus of the family Histeridae. H. helluo is an example.

Histeridae (his-ter'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Hister + -idae.] A family of clavicorn Coleoptera, typified by the genus Hister, having geniculate antennae. The larvae are long, with horny head and prothorax, and no ocelli. They are small beetles, for the most part round, hard, and seed-like in appearance. They generally live upon decaying animal or vegetable matter. The same or similar groups are known as Histerida, Histerini, Histerites, and Histeroides.

histie (his'ti), a. [Origin obscure.] Dry; barren. [Scotch.]*

Adorns the histie stibble-field.

Burns, Mountain Daisy.

histioid (his'ti-oid), a. [cf. Gr. istion, dim. of istós, a web, tissue, + eidōs, form.] Resembling tissue; having a superficial resemblance to tissue.

histiology (his-ti-ol'ō-jī), n. [cf. Gr. istion, dim. of istós, a web, tissue (see histioid), + -λογία, < λέγω, speak: see -ology.] Same as histology.

Histiophoridae (his'ti-ō-fōr'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Histiophorus + -idae.] A family of scombroid acanthopterygian fishes, the sail-fishes, spear-fishes, or bill-fishes, near relatives of the true sword-fishes, Xiphiidae. The body is elongated and more or less compressed; the snout is prolonged into an ensiform weapon; there is a long and sometimes very large spinous dorsal fin, or "sail"; and the ventral fins are modified into long slender spines, with at least one soft ray. The leading genera are Histiophorus and Tetrapturus. The species inhabit warm seas and are of large size, though smaller than the sword-fish. See cuts under sail-fish and spear-fish.

Histiophorus (his-ti-ōf'ō-rus), n. [NL., < Gr. istion, a sail, a sheet, a web (see histioid), + φέρειν = L. ferre = E. bear.] 1. The typical genus of Histiophoridae. H. gladius is the common sail-fish, spear-fish, or bill-fish. See cut under sail-fish. 2. A genus of mammals. J. E. Gray, 1838. [In senses 1 and 2 also written Istiophorus.] 3. A genus of mollusks. Pease, 1860.

Histurus (his-ti-ū-rus), n. [NL., < Gr. istion, a sail (see histioid), + οὐρά, tail.] 1. A notable genus of lizards, with a dorsal and a caudal crest, the latter highly developed. The sail-lizard of Amboyna, H. amboinensis, is an enormous tree-lizard about 4 feet long. Also written Isturus. G. Cuvier, 1829.

2. A genus of fishes. Costa, 1850.

histochemical (his-tō-kem'i-kal), a. [cf. Gr. istós, a web, tissue (see histoid), + E. chemical.] Of or pertaining to histochemistry.

Turning now to the chemical constitution of the animal cell, we find ourselves entering upon a field of histochemical inquiry of which little is known.

Prey, Histol. and Histochem. (trans.), p. 72.

histochemistry (his-tō-kem'is-tri), n. [cf. Gr. istós, a web, tissue, + E. chemistry.] That branch of chemistry which treats of the chemical ingredients and constitution of the structural elements or tissues of the animal body, as well as of their decomposition products.

histodialysis (his-tō-di-al'i-sis), n. [cf. Gr. istós, a web, tissue, + διάλωσις, dissolution: see dialysis.] 1. A morbid dissolution of the tissues. Dunghison.

histogenesis (his-tō-jen'e-sis), n. [cf. Gr. istós, a web, tissue, + γένεσις, generation.] Same as histogeny.

The development of the spinal cord in Mammals differs in no important respects from that of the chick, and we have nothing to add to the account we have already given of its general development and histogenesis in that animal. Poster, Embryology, II. xii. 367.

histogenetic (his'tō-jē-net'ik), a. [cf. histogeny: see genetic.] Pertaining to histogeny or histogenesis; relating to the formation of tissue: as, a histogenetic process or result; a histogenetic cell.

In certain of the lower animals, the substance of the body is not differentiated into histogenetic elements: that is, into cells which, by their metamorphoses, give rise to tissues. Huxley, Encyc. Brit., II. 50.

histogenetically (his'tō-jē-net'ik-al-i), adv. From a histogenetic point of view.

They [connective tissues] are, as Rindfleisch points out, intimately bound up with the plasmatic circulation or the ultimate diffusion of the juices; they are in closest relation with the terminal nerve-plexuses; and, histogenetically, they are the remains of that "parablastic" embryonic tissue from which the blood channels themselves were made. Encyc. Brit., XVIII. 400.

histogenic (his-tō-jen'ik), a. [cf. histogeny + -ic.] Productive of tissue; specifically, of or pertaining to histogeny; histogenic.

histogeny (his-toj'ē-nī), n. [cf. Gr. istós, a web, tissue, + -γένεσις, < γενέω, producing: see -gen.] The origination and development or formation of organic tissues or textures; the fabrication by cells of cells and cell-products; the integration, differentiation, and specialization of structural form-elements. Also histogenesis.

histographic (his-tō-graf'ik), a. [cf. Histography + -ic.] Pertaining to histography.

histography (his-tog'ra-fī), n. [cf. Gr. istós, a web, tissue, + -γραφία, < γράφειν, write.] A description of organic tissues; also, an account of histogenetic processes.

histohæmatin, histohæmatin (his-tō-hem'ā-tin), n. [cf. Gr. istós, a web, tissue, + αἷμα (-), blood, + -ίνη. Cf. hematin.] One of a series of animal coloring matters or pigmentary substances found in invertebrates. See myohæmatin.

This paper contains an account of observations made on the spectra of the organs and tissues of invertebrates and vertebrates, which have brought to light the presence of a series of animal coloring matters which had not previously been discovered. The name histohæmatins is proposed for all these coloring matters, and that of myohæmatin for the intrinsic pigment occurring in striped muscle which belongs to the same series. Dr. C. A. MacMunn, Proc. Roy. Soc., XXXIX. 248.

histoid (his'toid), a. [cf. Gr. istós, a web (in mod. physiol. a tissue), prop. the (upright) beam of a loom, hence the warp fixed to the beam, the web, etc. (< ισταῖν, stand, = E. stand), + eidōs, form.] Like or involving organic tissue; particularly, of the connective-tissue group.—Histoid tumor, a tumor composed of tissue of the connective-tissue group, such as a sarcoma, fibroma, myxoma, or lipoma.

histologic (his-tō-loj'ik), a. [cf. histology + -ic.] Of or pertaining to histology: as, histologic investigations.

Nerve-tubes with their contained protein-threads, and nerve-cells with their contained and surrounding masses of changing protein-substance, are the histologic elements of which the nervous system is built up. H. Spencer, Prin. of Psychol., § 10.

histological (his-tō-loj'ik-al), a. [cf. histologic + -al.] Same as histologic.

histologically (his-tō-loj'ik-al-i), adv. In a histological way, mode, or manner; with reference to histology.

histologist (his-tō-loj'ist), n. [cf. histology + -ist.] One who is versed in histology; a microscopic anatomist.

histology (his-tol'ō-jī), n. [cf. Gr. istós, a web, tissue, + -λογία, < λέγω, speak: see -ology.] That branch of anatomy which is concerned with the structure, especially the microscopic structure, of the various tissues of the body; histomorphology. Vegetable histology is that branch of histology which is concerned with the microscopic structure of the tissues of plants. Sometimes written histology.

histolysis (his-tol'i-sis), n. [NL., < Gr. istós, a web, tissue, + λίσσις, solution, < λίσσω, loose, dissolve.] Degeneration, disintegration, or dissolution of organic tissue; destruction of histologic continuity by the decay or death of cells and cell-products.

histolytic (his-tō-lit'ik), a. [cf. histolysis (-lyt-) + -ic.] Of or pertaining to histolysis; characterized by decay or dissolution of tissue: as, histolytic changes in the tissues.

histomorphological (his-tō-mōr-fōl'ō-jī-kal), a. [cf. histomorphology + -ic-al.] Pertaining to the morphology of organic tissues.

But there are to be noted other histomorphological particulars which are presented, of clear significance. Allen, and Neur., IV. 387.

histomorphology (his'tō-mōr-fōl'ō-jī), n. [cf. Gr. istós, a web, tissue, + E. morphology, q. v.] The morphology of organic tissues; histology, with special reference to the forms assumed by various tissues.

histonomy (his-ton-'ō-mi), n. [Gr. ιστός, a web, tissue, + νόμος, a law.] The laws of the formation and arrangement of the organic tissues.

Histopodes, Histopodes (his-top-'ē-dēz, -ō-dēz), n. pl. [Prop. Histopodes; < Gr. ιστάω, cause to stand, set up (cf. ιστός, anything set up, a mast, loom, etc.), + πόδι (pod-), L. pes (ped-) = E. foot.] A name applied to the Eunomians, who in the practice of baptism immersed the head and breast and held the feet in the air.

histophily (his-'tō-fi-li), n. [NL., < Gr. ιστός, a web, tissue, + φιλία, a tribe.] The comparative history of organic tissues within the limits of a given phylum or tribe of animals. [Rare.]

Tribal history of the cells, hardly attempted as yet. . . . Histophily. Haeckel, Evol. of Man (trans.), I. 24.

histophysiological (his-tō-'fiz-i-ō-'lōj-i-kal), a. [Gr. ιστός, tissue, + E. physiological, q. v.] Of or pertaining to the physiology or functional activity of the tissues of the body.

historian (his-tō-'ri-an), n. [Formerly historien; < OF. historien, a. and n., F. historien, < ML. as if historianus*, < L. historia, history: see history.] 1. A writer, compiler, or narrator of history.

Dubb'd historians by express command,
To enrol your triumphs o'er the seas and land.
Pope, Imit. of Horace, II. l. 372.

Historian, who . . . hast . . . vouchsafed
This friendly condescension to relate Things else by me unsearchable.
Milton, P. L., viii. 7.

2. One who is versed in history. [Rare.]

Great captains should be good historians. South.

historiated (his-tō-'ri-ā-ted), a. [ML. historiatus, pp. of historiare, narrate, depict: see history, v.] Decorated with figures of animals, flowers, human beings, etc., as the large illuminated letters of medieval manuscripts, and in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries woodcut initial letters for books, or as surface-ornament in carving, etc. A distinction is sometimes made between such ornament containing figures of men and animals, which is distinctively called historiated, and that made up merely of flowers, etc., which is called floreated.

historic (his-tor-'ik), a. [F. historique = Sp. histórico = Pg. historico = It. istorico (cf. D. G. historisch = Dan. Sw. historisk), < L. historicus, < Gr. ιστορικός, < ιστορία, history: see history.] 1. Of or pertaining to history or historians; containing or conveying history.

Here, rising bold, the patriot's honest face;
There, warriors frowning in historic brass.
Pope, Epistle to Addison, I. 58.

The vast power and domination of the Roman empire
. . . have dazzled the historic eye.
De Quincey, Philos. of Roman Hist.

A hoard of tales that dealt with knights,
Half-legend, half-historic.
Tennyson, Princess, Prolog.

To be really historic, I should have mentioned that before going to look for the Rhone I had spent part of the evening on the opposite side of the little place.
H. James, Jr., Little Tour, p. 193.

2. Noted or famous in history.

My first introduction to the historic scenes which have since engaged so many years of my life must be ascribed to an accident.
Gibbon, Memoirs.

historical (his-tor-'i-kal), a. [< historic + -al.] 1. Of, pertaining to, or connected with history; containing or of the nature or character of history: as, a historical poem; historical evidence; a historical chart.

The best actors in the world, either for tragedy, comedy, . . . historical-pastoral, . . . or poem unlimited.
Shak., Hamlet, II. 2.

In this view of a supreme divinity he [Julian] made an approach to the Christian monotheism, but substituted an airy myth and pantheistic fancy for the only true and living God and the personal history of Christ.

Schaff, Hist. Christ. Church, III. § 4.

The English Constitution . . . is merely a collection of historical precedents, and for that reason it is held in highest reverence. Stille, Stud. Med. Hist., p. 189.

2. Narrated or mentioned in history; belonging to the past, and mentioned or used at present only with reference to the past. In this sense the terms of archaeology, ancient and medieval art, law, etc., as used in modern books with reference to the past, are historical, and are thus distinguished from obsolete words, such as have no present use at all.

3. In philos., pertaining to things learned from the testimony of others or by our own senses.

—4. In gram., used in statement of past facts or narration of past events: as, a historical tense.

The historical present is the present tense used in vivid narration, as in the following passage: "And, behold, there cometh one of the rulers of the synagogue, Jairus by name; and when he saw him, he fell at his feet." (Mark v. 22.) In Greek grammar the tenses purely past in meaning—that is, the imperfect, aorist (English simple preterit without have), and the pluperfect indicative—are called historical tenses, as distinguished from the present, future, and perfect (English preterit with have), the perfect not being accounted a past tense. (See perfect.) In Latin, also, the corresponding tenses are called historical, and, as the Latin perfect answers in meaning both to the Greek aorist and to the Greek perfect, when used as an aorist it is distinguished as the historical perfect. The infinitive can be used in Latin in narration, and is then called the historical infinitive.—Historical cognition, credibility, geography, etc. See the nouns.—Historical method.

(a) The study of an abstract theory in the light of the history of the object to be investigated. (b) In hydrodynamics, the Lagrangian method, which considers the path of each particle.—Historical school, in jurisprudence, the school of jurists who maintain that law is not to be regarded as made by commands of the sovereign, but is, like the language of a nation, the result of its historical and social circumstances. The principal authors of this school are Savigny and Puchta.

historically (his-tor-'i-kal-i), adv. In the manner of history; according to history; as history; by way of narration.

The gospels . . . do all historically declare something which our Lord Jesus Christ himself either spoke, did, or suffered.
Hooker, Eccles. Polity.

Evelyn, Diary, May 6, 1645.

history (his-tō-'ri), n.; pl. histories (-riz). [< ME. historie (abbr. storie, > E. story, q. v.), late ME. also histoire, after F.: cf. OF. estoire, histoire, F. histoire = Pr. histoire, estoria, storia = Sp. Pg. historia = It. istoria = D. G. Dan. historie = Sw. historia, < L. historia, < Gr. ιστορία, a learning or knowing by inquiry, the knowledge so obtained, information, a narrative, history, < ιστορ or ιστορ, knowing, learned, a wise man, a judge, for ιστορ*, < εἰδέναι, know, 2d aor. ίδεν, see, = E. wit, know: see wit, v.] 1. A narrative, oral or written, of past events; a story: as, a history of England; a history of the civil war; a history of an individual.

Ther-off scripture make as an historie,
To end that ay ther-of be memorie.
Rom. of Partenay (E. E. T. S.), Int. I. 118.

I have heard a pretty history concerning this mountain.
Corjay, Crudities, I. 91.

2. The recorded events of the past; also, that branch of science which is occupied with ascertaining and recording the facts of the past. History may deal with the past development of human affairs as a whole, or with some special phase of human activity, as in political history, ecclesiastical history, the history of philosophy, etc., or with the life of animals, as in natural history; or with inorganic nature, as in geological history; but with reference to the lower animals and to inanimate nature the term has often no special implication of past time (see natural history, below).

It is the true office of history to represent the events themselves together with the counsels, and to leave the observations and conclusions thereupon to the liberty and faculty of every man's judgment.

Bacon, Advancement of Learning, II. 136.

I have read somewhere or other—in Dionysius of Halicarnassus, I think—that history is philosophy teaching by example.

Already for each
I see history preparing a statue and niche.
Lowell, Fable for Critics.

It is a favorite maxim of mine that history, while it should be scientific in its method, should pursue a practical object. That is, it should not only gratify the reader's curiosity about the past, but modify his view of the present, and his forecast of the future.

J. R. Seeley, Expansion of England, Int.

We do not so much want history explained after the manner of science as we want it portrayed and interpreted after the manner of literature.

The Century, XXVII. 926.

3. Recorded or accomplished fact; also, the aggregate of the events, recorded or unrecorded, which mark a given period of past time, as in the development of an individual or of a race, etc.: as, a checked history.

Per. Where were you bred? . . .
Mar. If I should tell my history, it would seem Like lies disdained in the reporting.
Shak., Pericles, v. 1.

One man in his time plays many parts,
His acts being seven ages. . . . Last scene of all,
That ends this strange eventful history,
Is second childishness. Shak., As you Like it, ii. 7.

All town-sprinkled lands that be,
Sailing through stars with all their history.

Emerson, Monadnock.

The history of Europe, the history of Aryan man in Europe, the history of man as a really civilized and political being, begins in the lands round the Mediterranean, and of them it begins in the islands and peninsulas of Greece.

E. A. Freeman, Amer. Lects., p. 277.

4. An eventful career; a past worthy of record: as, a man with a history.—5t. In liturgies, in mediæval English uses, as in the Use of Sarum, the series of responsories to a set oflections from the historical or other books of Scripture. The history was named from the initial words of the first responsory, and these were often also used as the name of the Sunday on which the history was said, or of the period following during which thelections continued to be taken from the book then begun.

6. A historical play or drama.

The national history likewise continued to furnish subjects; and the chronicle history remained a favourite species of dramatic composition.

A. W. Ward, Eng. Dram. Lit., i. 146.

Ancient history, the history of man from the earliest authentic records to the destruction of the Roman empire, A. D. 476.—Classical history, the history of the Greeks and Romans.—Ecclesiastical history. See ecclesiastical.—Mediæval history, the history of the period which extends from A. D. 476 to the beginning of the sixteenth century. See middle ages, under ages.—Modern history, the history of the period which extends from the close of the middle ages to the present time. Some German historians subdivide modern history into later history (from 1492 to the beginning of the French revolution in 1789) and latest history (from 1789 to the present time).—Natural history, a popular designation of the study and description of natural objects, as animals, plants, and minerals, especially the two former, as distinguished from civil, ecclesiastical, military, etc., history.—Profane history, the history of secular events, as distinguished from sacred history.—Sacred history, the history recorded in the Bible.—Tribal history. Same as phylogeny; distinguished from germ-history, or ontogeny.—Syn. History, Chronicle, Annals; record, recital, story, relation. History in its general sense includes chronicles, annals, biography, autobiography, and even travels: as, the history of a journey. In a restricted sense it is an orderly account of the principal events affecting the people of a nation or district for a given period. It is sometimes divided into history proper and philosophical history, the former paying attention simply to the events themselves, the latter showing the events in connection with their causes and effects. When the order of time is most conspicuous, the history is a chronicle, which is generally divided into sections, each section covering a separate period of time. Annals are a form of chronicle in which the subdivision into periods is by years. Chronicles and annals are, however, sometimes used as names for simple and unpretending histories.

history (his'tō-ri), v. t.; pret. and pp. historied, ppr. historying. [OF. historier; < ML. historiare, narrate, depict; < L. historia, history; see history, n.] To record; relate. [Rare.]

5. A kind of velocipede; the draisine.

He [Baron von Drais] at any rate introduced into England from France the hobby-horse. This machine consisted of two stout equal-sized wooden wheels held in iron forks, the rear fork being securely bolted to a stout bar of wood, "the perch," whilst the front fork passed through the perch, and was so arranged that it could be turned by a handle, so as to steer the machine after the manner of a modern bicycle. Bury and Hillier, Cycling, p. 55.

Hobby-horse dance. See the quotation.

Bromley Pagets was remarkable for a very singular sport on New Year's Day and Twelfth Day, called the Hobby Horse Dance; a person rode upon the image of a horse, with a bow and arrow in his hands, with which he made a snapping noise, keeping time with the music, whilst six others danced the hay and other country dances, with as many rein-deer's heads on their shoulders. To this hoby by horse belonged a pot, which the revues of the town kept and filled with cakes and ale, towards which the spectators contributed a penny, and with the remainder maintained their poor, and repaired the church. Mirror, xix, 223. (Halliwel.)

hocus-pocus (hō'kus-pō'kus), n. and a. [A sham-Latin riming formula, mere jugglers' jargon, variously reflected in D. hokus-bokus, G. Dan. Sw. hokus-pokus, formerly also ockes-bockes, ockes bokes, F. hoccus-bocus, etc.; E. also hoky-poky; cf. hanky-panky, of similar sense and origin. "According to Turner, in his 'History of the Anglo-Saxons,' from Ochus Bochus, a magician and demon of the Northern mythology; according to Tillotson, a corruption of hoc est corpus, uttered by Romish priests on the elevation of the host" (Webster's Dict.); but these are mere inventions of the fancy.] 1. n. 1. A juggler; a trickster.

Dancing wenches, hocus-pocuses, and other antics past my remembrance. Sir T. Herbert, Travels in Africa, p. 154.

My mother could juggle as well as any hocus-pocus in the world.

J. Kirk, Seven Champions, quoted in Strutt's Sports and Pastimes, p. 290.

2. A jugglers' trick; a cheat used by conjurers; jugglery.

Convey men's interest, and right,
From Stiles's pocket into Nokes's,
As easily as hocus-pocus. S. Butler, Hudibras, III. iii. 716.

Our author is playing hocus pocus in the very similitude he takes from that juggler, and would slip upon you, as he phrases it, a counter for a grant.

Bentley, Free Thinking, § 12.

If the doctrine is an imposture. . . it would be interesting to have it pointed out by what extraordinary hocus-pocus the scientific men of the present age have been imposed upon in accepting it. Pop. Sci. Mo., XXVIII. 655.

II. a. Juggling; cheating.

That Burlesque is a Hocus-Pocus trick they have got, which, by the virtue of Helius doctor's topsy turvey, they make a wise and witty Man in the World a Fool upon the Stage, you know not how. Wycherley, Country Wife, iii.

Such hocus-pocus tricks, I own, Belong to Gallic bards alone. Mason, tr. of Horace's Odes, iv. 8.

hocus-pocus (hō'kus-pō'kus), v. t.; pret. and pp. hocus-pocussed or hocus-pocussed, ppr. hocus-pocusing or hocus-pocussing. [< hocus-pocus, n.] To juggle; deceive; cheat.

This gift of hocus-pocusing and of disguising matters is surprising. Sir R. L'Estrange.

hocus-pocusly (hō'kus-pō'kus-li), adv. By jugglery; cheatingly.

Many of their hearers are not only methodistically convinced or alarmed, but are also hocus-pocusly converted. Life of J. Lackington, letter vii.

hod¹ (hod), v. t. and i. [A dial. var., like haud, etc., of hold¹.] To hold. [Prov. Eng.] hod² (hod), n. [A dial. var., like hūd, haid, etc., of hold²: see hold², v. and n.] The E. hod, hot², F. hotte, a basket for carrying on the back, is a different word.] 1. A form of portable trough for carrying mortar and bricks to masons and bricklayers, fixed crosswise on the end of a pole or handle and borne on the shoulder. See cut under hod-elevator.—2. A coal-scuttle.—3. A form of blowpipe used by pewterers. It consists of a cast-iron pot with a close cover, containing ignited charcoal. A stream of air is forced through it by means of a bellows worked by the foot, the air entering through a pipe and nozzle on one side and passing out through a nozzle on the opposite side, which directs the current of hot air upon the object to be soldered.

4. A tub made of half a flour-barrel to which handles are fitted, used for carrying alewives. It is also a measure, holding about 200 of these fish. [Maine, U. S.].—5. A hole under the bank of a stream, as a retreat for fish. [Prov. Eng.] hog¹ (hog), n. [ME. hog, hōge, hogge, a gelded hog, a young sheep (cf. in comp. hog-pig, a barrow-pig, hog-colt, a young colt, hogget, a sheep or colt after it has passed its first year, and obs. E. hoggerel, hoggerel, a young sheep, hogstaster, hogster, a boar in its third year, also a lamb after its first year, hoglin, a boar); prob. < hog¹, v., a var. of hog³, which is a var. of hack¹, cut: see hog¹, v., hog³, and hack¹. The term is applied to a 'cut' or gelded boar, to a sheep 'cut' or shorn the first year, or just after the first year, hence a young sheep, and hence extended to a young colt. There is no sufficient evidence for the current etymology from W. huch, a sow, = Corn. hoch, a pig, hog, = Bret. houch, hoch, a hog, = Ir. suig, ult. = AS. sugu, sū, E. sow²: see sow².] 1†. A gelded pig; a barrow-pig.—2. An omnivorous non-ruminant mammal of the family Suidæ, suborder Artiodactyla, and order Ungulata; a pig, sow, or boar; a swine. All the varieties of the domestic hog are derived from the wild boar, Sus scrofa. (See boar.) The river-hogs are somewhat aquatic African species of the genus Potamochoerus. The babirusa is a true hog of the same family, Suidæ. See cut under babirusa.

Shall I keep your hogs, and eat husks with them?

Shak., As you Like it, i. 1.

But for one piece they thought it hard
From the whole hog to be debar'd.

Cowper, Love of the World Reproved.

3. Some animal like or likened to a hog, not of the family Suidæ. See wart-hog, Phacochærus, peccary, and Dicotyles.—4. A sheep shorn in the first year, or just after the first year; a young sheep. [Prov. Eng.]—5. A young colt.—6. A bullock a year old. [Prov. Eng.]—7. One who has the characteristics of the hog; a mean, stingy, grasping, gluttonous, or filthy person. [Colloq.]—8. Naut., a sort of scrubbing-broom for scraping a ship's bottom under water.—9. A stirrer or agitator in the pulp-vat of a paper-making plant.—10†. A shilling, or perhaps a sixpence. [Old slang.]

hog¹ (hog), v.; pret. and pp. hogged, ppr. hogging. [In def. 1 prob. a var. of hog³ for hack¹, cut; the orig., and not a derivative, of hog¹, n., to which, however, the later senses are due. Cf. MLG. hōggen, a secondary form of houwen = E. hew, to which hack¹ is ult. referred.] I. trans. 1. To cut (the hair) short: as, to hog a horse's mane. [Prov. Eng.]—2. To scrape (a ship's bottom) under water.—3. [With ref. to hogback, q. v. The resemblance to G. hocken, carry on the back, get upon one's back, also set in heaps, < hocke, a heap or shock of sheaves, also the back, seems to be accidental.] To carry on the back. [Local, Eng.]

II. intrans. 1. To droop at both ends, so as to resemble in some degree a hog's back in outline: said of the bottom of a ship when in this condition either through faulty construction or from accident.

As a result it was found that the extremities tended to droop with reference to the midship part, and the ship was said to break, this particular form of breakage being termed hogging.

Thearle, Naval Arch., § 183.

2. In the manège, to hold or carry the head down, like a hog.

hog² (hog), n. [Origin obscure; by some identified with hog¹, as "laggard stones that manifest a pig-like indolence," or, it might be thought, in allusion to the helplessness of a hog on ice, there being in the United States an ironical simile, "as independent as a hog on ice." But neither this explanation nor that which brings in D. hok, a pen, kennel, sty, dock, is supported by any evidence. Perhaps first applied not to the stone, but to the hog-score or line 'cut' in the ice, < hog¹, cut, and thus in fact connected in another way with hog¹, q. v.] In the game of curling, a stone which does not go over the hog-score; also, the hog-score itself. [Scotch.] hog² (hog), v. t.; pret. and pp. hogged, ppr. hogging. [< hog², n.] In curling, to play, as a stone, with so little force that it does not clear the hog-score. [Scotch.] hogat (hō'gan), n. [Abbr. of Hogan-Mogan (or Hogen-Mogen) rug.] A kind of strong liquor.

Those who toast all the family royal
In bumpers of Hogan and Nog
Have hearts not more true or more loyal Than mine to my sweet Molly Mog.

Gay, Molly Mog.

For your reputation we keep to ourselves your not hunting nor drinking hogan, either of which here would be sufficient to lay your honour in the dust.

Gray, Letters, I. 12.

The foxes have holes, and the birds of the air have nests.

Mat. vii. 20.

Hence—3. A narrow, dark, or obscure lodging or place; especially, an obscure lodging for one in hiding, or a secret room for a prohibited or disreputable business, as for counterfeiting, unlicensed printing, liquor-selling, etc.: as, a rum-hole.

At a Catholique house, he [Charles II.] was fain to lie in the priests hole a good while in the house for his privacy.

Pepys, Diary, May 23, 1660.

The strangest hole I ever was in has been to-day at a place called Portici, where his Sicilian Majesty has a country-seat.

Grosy, Letters, i. 82.

Many Printers for Lucre of Gain have gone into Holes, and then their chief care is to get a Hole Private, and Workmen Trusty and Cunning to conceal the Hole and themselves.

Mozon, Mech. Exercises, p. 380.

4†. The hollow interior of a ship: now called, by corruption, the hold. See hold³.

When you let anything downe into the howle, lowering it by degrees, they say, Amaine; and being down, Strike.

Smith, Seaman's Gram., vii. 33. (N. E. D.)

We . . . used them kindly, yet got them away with all the speede we could, that they should not be perceived by them in the howle.

Quoted in Capt. John Smith's Works, i. 111.

5. An indentation in the coast; a cove, or small harbor, as Holmes's Hole in Martha's Vineyard, and Wood's Hole on the coast opposite; a narrow passage or waterway between two islands, as Robinson's Hole, in the same region. In 1875 the name Wood's Hole was changed to Wood's Holl, in conformity with the (unfounded) supposition that hole in such local names is a corruption of a Norse word hill, meaning 'hill' (see etymology of hill¹), introduced by the Norsemen in the tenth century, and preserved from that remote period by the American Indians.

This [flag] was to be raised at a good anchoring place called Five-Fathom Hole.

Ellis, Voyage to Hudson's Bay (1748), p. 149.

6. A level grassy area surrounded by mountains: a word formerly much in use and still current in the northern parts of the Rocky Mountains. Such places are also sometimes called *park*s, and occasionally, in certain regions, basins. The use of the term hole implies a more complete isolation and environment of mountains than does that of basin. Park is a more familiar name for localities of this kind in the southern Rocky Mountains.

7. A puzzling situation; a scrape; a fix. [Colloq.]

I should take great pleasure in serving you, and getting you out of this hole, but my Lord, you know, is a great man, and can, in a manner, do what he pleases with poor people.

C. Johnston, Chrysalis, i. 132.

A hole in one's coat, figuratively, a flaw in one's reputation; a weak spot in one's character.

I do perceive he is not the man that he would gladly make show to the world he is; if I find a hole in his coat, I will tell him my mind.

Shak., Hen. V., iii. 6.

If there's a hole in a' your coats,

I rede you tent it;

A chiel's amang ye takin' notes,
An', faith, he'll prent it.

Burns, Captain Grose's Peregrinations.

Blind holes, bobstay holes, etc. See the qualifying words.—Dead holes, shallow holes in cast-iron.—Fox in the hole! See fox¹.—Hole in the sky. Same as cloud-sack, 2.—The hole, the name of one of the worst apartments in the Counter prison in Wood street, London.

I shall never find the way out again: my debts, my debts! I'm like to die i' th' hole now.

Middleton, The Widow, ii. 2.

He is deni'de the freedom of the prison,

And in the hole is laid with men condemn'd.

Heywood, Woman Killed with Kindness.

Toad in a hole. See toad.—To crawl into one's hole, to retire defeated; used especially of an aggressor who is worsted. [Colloq.]—To put (or get) one in a hole, to get one into a position from which he cannot easily or honorably extricate himself. [Slang.]—Syn. 1. Opening, cave, cavity, excavation, hollow.—3. Den, kennel, hovel.

hole¹ (hōl), v.; pret. pp. holed, pp. holing. holeful, a. Same as headful.

holer¹ (hō'lér), n. [< hole¹ + -er¹.] In mining, one who undercuts the coal-seam, generally for two or three feet inward (but sometimes for as much as four or even five), with a light pick, and then by driving in wedges breaks away the parts that have been holed.

holer², holour, n. [ME., also holier, huler, hullar, etc., < OF. holier, houlier, holour, houlour (ML. hullarius), a ribald, debauchee, < hole, houle, a place of debauch, a brothel.] A ribald; a rake; a scoundrel.

Holeraceæ (hōl-ér-ā-sē-ā), n. pl. [NL., fem. pl. of L. holeraceus, prop. oleraceus, herb-like, < holus, prop. olus (oler-), herbs, vegetables.] The fifty-third order in the natural system of plants proposed by Linnaeus, containing Spinacia, Herniaria, Callitriche, etc., genera that are now referred to widely separated natural orders.

hole-stitch (hōl'stich), n. A stitch used in making pillow-lace to form small round openings in the thick parts of the pattern.

holeit, n. [ME., < hole¹ + -it.] A little hole.

Thel entriden . . . in to a litle hole that was the west part of the tabernacle.

Wyclif, Select Works, ii. 231.

And he hadd grete mervelley, and asked thame if they hadd any other howes, and they answered and said, nay, bot in their holietes duelle we alwaye, and in thir caves.

MS. Lincoln, A. I. 17, f. 30. (Halliwell.)

holethnic (hō-leth'nik), a. [< holethnos + -ic.] Pertaining or relating to a holethnos, or parent race.

The holethnic history of the Aryans. The Academy.

holethnos (hō-leth'nos), n. [< Gr. ὅλος, entire, whole, + ἔθνος, nation.] A primitive or parent stock or race of people not yet divided into separate tribes or branches.

It seems hard to avoid the conclusion that the various Aryan nations of historical times are, linguistically speaking, descended from a single primitive tribe, conveniently termed the Aryan holēthnos, in contradistinction to its later representatives as marked off by such lines of distinction as are found between Hindus and Greeks, and between the latter and Teutons or Celts. The Academy.

Holetra (hō-lē' trā), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. ὅλος, entire, whole, + τρον, abdomen.] A term applied by Herman (1807) to a division of tracheate arachnids, including both the harvestmen and the mites, forming the present orders Phalangida and Acarida.

hollowort (hōl' wört), n. Same as hollowort. holibut, holibutter. See halibut, halibutter. holidamer, n. A form of halidom, simulating holy dame. See halidom.

holiday (hol'i-dā), n. and a. [Formerly also holliday, hollyday; < ME. holliday, haliday (= Dan. helligdag = Sw. helgdag), usually written separately, holi day, holy day, hali day, etc. (the vowel of holy being shortened as in holibut), < AS. hālig dæg, 'holy day'; see holy and day. Cf. holingnight.] I. n. 1. A consecrated day; a religious anniversary; a day set apart for commemorating some important event or in honor of some person.

Every holliday through the yeere, Changed shall thy garment be,
Robin Hood and the Curtall Fryer (Child's Ballads, [V. 278].)

The holiest of all hollidays are those Kept by ourselves in silence and apart,
The secret anniversaries of the heart.
Longfellow, Holidays.

2. An occasion of joy and gaiety.

In Heav'n, one Holly-day, you read
In heed Anacreon, Ganymede Drew useless Cupid in.
Prior, Cupid and Ganymede.

My approach has made a little holliday,
And every face was dress'd in smiles to meet me.
Rowe, Jane Shore, v. 1.

3. A day of exemption from labor, or of recreation and amusement; a day or a number of days during which ordinary occupations are suspended, either by an individual or by a community.

Necessities nath never holliday:
Take heed on that.
Palladius, Husbondrie (E. E. T. S.), p. 7.

If all the year were playing hollidays,
To sport would be as tedious as to work.
Shak., 1 Hen. IV., i. 2.

4. Naut., a spot carelessly left uncoated in tarring or painting a ship or its appurtenances.—Blindman's holiday. See blindman.—Legal holiday, a secular day which the law allows, for some purposes at least, to be treated like Sunday in reference to the suspension of business. The phrase is commonly applied to those days which by statute are treated like Sunday, in reference to the presentment, for payment or acceptance, and the protest and notice of dishonor, of negotiable paper, and for the purpose of closing public offices—with this qualification, however, that paper falling due on such a legal holiday is usually to be presented on the next secular day, instead of on the previous day, as is the case in the absence of statute with paper bearing days of grace maturing on Sunday. See bank holiday.

II. a. Pertaining to a festival; befitting a holiday; cheerful; joyous; hence, suited only to a holiday; dainty; not fitted for serious action or life.

It is a holiday work to visit the prisoners, for they be kept from sermons.

Latimer, 5th Sermon bef. Edw. VI., 1549.

Now I am in a holiday humour.

Shak., As You Like It, iv. 1.

With many holiday and lady terms
He question'd me. Shak., 1 Hen. IV., i. 3.

Courage is but a holiday kind of virtue, to be seldom exercised.

Dryden.

Lack-a-day, they have never seen any service—Holiday soldiers!

S. Foote, Mayor of Garratt, i. 1.

To speak holiday, to speak choicely or daintily.

What say you to young master Fenton? he capers, he dances, he has eyes of youth, he writes verses, he speaks holiday, he smells April and May.

Shak., M. W. of W., iii. 2.

holiday (hol'i-dā), v. i. [< holiday, n.] To make holiday; go pleasuring; waste time in play. [Rare.]

We cannot rid ourselves of a lurking suspicion that the holidaying fisherman is a little of a pharisee—not an obnoxious one, but pardonable, even available in his self-righteousness.

The Critic, V. 165.

holidayism (hol'i-dā-izm), n. [< holiday + -ism.] The character of a holiday.

Under the working of the civil law as the prominent element of authority, Sunday has tended and must tend to holidayism.

Pop. Sci. Mo., XXIX. 708.

holidomt, n. Same as halidom.

holily (hō'li-li), adv. [< ME. holily; < holy + -ly.] 1. In a holy or devout manner; piously; with sanctity.

She departed and come to hir owne house, and ledde holily hir lif.

Mervin (E. E. T. S.), i. 13.

2. Sacredly; inviolably; sinlessly; purely.

Friendship, a rare thing in princes, more rare between princes, that so holily was observed to the last of those two excellent men.

Sir P. Sidney.

3. By holy or righteous means.

What thou wouldst highly,
That wouldst thou holily; wouldst not play false,
And yet wouldst wrongly win. Shak., Macbeth, i. 5.

holiness (hō'li-nes), n. [< ME. holinesse, holynesse, halinesse, halignesce, < AS. hālignes, < hālig, holy; see holy and -ness.] 1. The state or character of being holy or sinless; purity of moral character; perfect freedom from all evil; sanctity.

And at medys of the Dyer the ffather Wardyn made a ryght holy sermon, and shewyd ryght Devoutly the holynesse of all the byssyd chosyn people of the holy londe.

Torkington, Diarie of Eng. Travell, p. 26.

Who is like unto thee, O Lord, among the gods? who is like thee, glorious in holiness, fearful in praises, doing wonders?

Ex. xv. 11.

Holiness becometh thine house, O Lord, for ever.

Ps. xciii. 5.

Now, as righteousness is but a heightened conduct, so holiness is but a heightened righteousness; a more finished, entire, and awe-filled righteousness.

M. Arnold, Literature and Dogma, i.

2. The state of anything hallowed, or consecrated to God or to his worship; sacredness.—His or your holiness, a title of the Pope, and of the Byzantine emperors; also formerly used of church dignitaries generally.

What's this—"To the Pope?"
The letter, as I live, with all the business
I writ to his holiness. Shak., Hen. VIII., iii. 2.

Arnold's Chron., 1502 (ed. 1811), p. 206.

The sark that he had on his back,

Was o' the holland sma'.

Johnie of Cocklemuir (Child's Ballads, VI. 18).

Any young fellow that affects to dress and appear genteelly, might with artificial management save ten pounds a year, as instead of fine holland he might mourn in sack-cloth.

Spectator, No. 360.

2. Unbleached linen cloth, made in many places, but especially in Scotland. There are two kinds, glazed and unglazed. Glazed holland, made smooth and heavy by sizing, is much used for window-shades; this is made of different sober colors, as buff, dark green, or blue gray, etc.—Brown holland, a plain linen cloth which has had little or no bleaching, but only a short boiling in water, or in weak soda-ash solution, followed by a weak souring. It retains, therefore, more or less closely the natural color of the retted flax-fiber.

Bright damask does penance in brown holland.

Dickens, Bleak House, xxix.

II. a. Made of linen from the Netherlands, or of unbleached linen.

She turned down the blankets fine,

Likewise the Holland sheet.

Tennyson, Princess, iii.

5. Not sincere or faithful; false; deceitful; not sound: as, a hollow heart.

Upon my soul, two reverend cardinal virtues;
But cardinal sins, and hollow hearts, I fear ye!
Shak., Hen. VIII., iii. 1.

Trust not this hollow world; she's empty: hark, she sounds.
Quarles, Emblems, ii. 10.

Talk about the weather and other well-bred topics is apt to seem a hollow device.
George Eliot, Middlemarch, I. 292.

6. Void of meaning or truth; empty; baseless: as, hollow oaths; a hollow mockery.

Thy dear love sworn [is] but hollow perjury.
Shak., R. and J., iii. 3.

7. Thorough; complete; out-and-out. [Slang.]

I have therefore taken a ouze in that locality, which in the opinion of my friends, is a hollow bargain (taxes ridiculous, and use of fixtures included in the rent).
Dickens, Bleak House, lxiv.

8. Having, as wool, the fibers torn apart, so that it is light and open.—Hollow ad. blow, fire, etc. See the nouns.—Hollow brick, in building, a brick or tile made hollow, or pierced with a series of holes placed side by side, used in vaulting or other masonry where lightness is desirable without appreciable sacrifice of strength. Such bricks are commonly molded to appropriate decorative or constructive forms.—Hollow muscles. See muscle.—Hollow spar. Same as hohlspath.—Hollow square, wall, etc. See the nouns.—Syn. 1. Empty, void, cavernous.—5. Faithless, insincere, treacherous, hypocritical.

hollow¹ (hol'ô), v. t. [*< hollow*¹, n. and a. The older verb is *hole*¹.] 1. To make hollow; excavate; make empty.

Some lonely elm,
That age or injury has hollow'd deep.
Cowper, Task, vi. 311.
We sat together and alone,
And to the want, that hollow'd all the heart,
Gave utterance by the yearning of an eye.
Tennyson, Love and Duty.

2. To bend into a curved or concave form.
Hollow your body more, sir, thus. Now stand fast o' your left leg, note your distance, keep your due proportion of time.
B. Jonson, Every Man in his Humour, i. 5.

Hollowing one hand against his ear,
To list a footfall, . . . stay'd the Ausonian king.
Tennyson, Palace of Art.

Hollowing and backing machine, in cooperage, a machine for shaping staves, giving the required convexity to the outer and the corresponding concavity to the inner faces.

hollow¹ (hol'ô), adv. [*< hollow*¹, a.] Beyond doubt or question; utterly; completely; out-and-out: often with all for emphasis: as, he beat him hollow, or all hollow; he carried it hollow. [Colloq.]

Wildfire reached the post, and Squire Burton won the match hollow.
Miss Edgeworth, Patronage, iii.

He had offered to race with him for a bowl of punch, and should have won it too, for Daredevil beat the goblin horse all hollow, but just as they came to the church-bridge, the Hessian bolted, and vanished in a flash of fire.
Irving, Sketch-Book, p. 445.

hollow² (hol'ô), interj. and v. A variant of hollo.
hollow-billed (hol'ô-bild), a. Having a bill appearing inflated and as if hollowed out: used specifically in the phrase hollow-billed coot, a local name in the United States of the surf-scooter, Oedemia perspicillata, and of the black scoter, O. americana.

hollow-eyed (hol'ô-id), a. Having sunken eyes.

A needy, hollow-eyed, sharp-looking wretch,
A living dead man. Shak., C. of E., v. 1.

Hollow-eyed Abstinence and lean Despair.
Cowper, Hope, l. 58.

hollowhead (hol'ô-hed), n. The black-bellied plover, Squatarola helvetica. G. Trumbull. [Local, U. S.]

hollow-hearted (hol'ô-hä'ted), a. Insincere; deceitful; not sound or true.

To our shores
Throng many doubtful hollow-hearted friends.
Shak., Rich. III., iv. 4.

The hollow-hearted, disaffected,
And close malignants are detected.
S. Butler, Hudibras, III. ii. 553.

hollow-horn (hol'ô-hörn), n. A disease of cattle, resulting in loss of the internal substance or core of the horn.

hollow-horned (hol'ô-hörn'd), a. Having hollow horns, non-deciduous, borne upon a bony core of the frontal bone; cavicorn: applied to typical ruminants, as the ox, sheep, etc.

hollowly (hol'ô-li), adv. [*< hollow*¹ + -ly².] In a hollow manner; insincerely; deceitfully.

Crown what I profess with kind event
If I speak true; if hollowly, invert
What best is boded me to mischief!

Shak., Tempest, iii. 1.

hollow-meat (hol'ô-mêt), n. The meat of fowls, rabbits, and other small animals, dressed, and sold whole, and not in pieces: opposed to butchers' meat. Also called hollow-ware. [Prov. Eng.]

hollowness (hol'ô-nes), n. [*< hollow*¹ + -ness.] 1. The state of being hollow; cavity; depression of surface; excavation.

Earth's hollowness, which the world's lungs are,
Have no more wind than the upper vault of air.
Donne, The Calm.

2. Emptiness; insincerity; deceitfulness; treachery.

Machinations, hollowness, treachery, and all ruinous disorders, follow us disquietly to our graves!
Shak., Lear, i. 2.

The hardness of most hearts, the hollowness of others, and the baseness and ingratitude of almost all.
South, Sermons.

The controversies of bygone centuries ring with a strange hollowness on the ear.
Lecky, Rationalism, I. 200.

hollow-plane (hol'ô-plân), n. [*< hollow*¹, n., + plane.] A molding-plane with a convex or concave sole.

hollowroot (hol'ô-rôt), n. A plant, Adoxa Moschatellina, of the natural order Caprifoliaceae.

hollow-stock (hol'ô-stok), n. A name given to the plants Leonotis nepetifolia and Malvastrum spicatum.

hollow-toned (hol'ô-tônd), a. Having a tone or sound like that coming from a cavity; deep-toned.

hollow-ware (hol'ô-wär), n. Same as hollow-meat.

hollowwort (hol'ô-wért), n. A succulent plant with pink flowers, Corydalis cava, related to the fumitory. Also hollowort.

holly¹ (hol'i), n. [< ME. holly, holly, holie; a var. of earlier holin, holym, > E. hollen, now only in dial. use: see hollen and *holm*².] 1. A plant of the genus Ilex, natural order Ericaceae.

American Holly (Ilex opaca). a, b, female and male flowers.

I. Aquifolium, the common European holly, of which there are many varieties, grows to the height of from 20 to 30 feet; the stem by age becomes large, and is covered with a smooth grayish bark, and set with branches which form a sort of cone. The leaves are oblong-oval, of a lucid green on the upper surface, but pale on the under surface; the edges are indented and waved, with sharp thorns terminating the points. The flowers grow in clusters, and are succeeded by roundish berries, which turn to a beautiful red about the end of September. This plant is a handsome evergreen, and excellently adapted for hedges and fences, since it bears clipping. The wood is hard and white, and is much employed for turnery-work, for drawing upon, for knife-handles, etc. Of the bark bird-life is made by maceration. Houses and churches are adorned with the leaves and berries at Christmas. The American holly, I. opaca, is also an evergreen tree, reaching in some instances a height of 45 feet and a diameter of 4 feet. It is similar to the European holly, from which it differs in having less glossy deep-green foliage, less bright red berries, and the nutlets not so velvety. It is distributed generally from Massachusetts south, and west to the valley of the Colorado river, attaining its greatest development in the rich bottoms of Arkansas and eastern Texas. The wood is of the highest class for interior finish and turnery. The Dahoon holly, I. Dahoon, a smaller and less valuable tree than I. opaca, is a native of the southern United States. The California holly is Heteromeles arbutifolia.

Heigh ho! sing heigh ho! unto the green holly.
Shak., As You Like It, ii. 7 (song).

When the bare and wintry woods we see,
What then so cheerful as the holly tree?
Southey, The Holly Tree.

With trembling fingers did we weave
The holly round the Christmas hearth.
Tennyson, In Memoriam, xxx.

2. The holm-oak, Quercus Ilex, an evergreen oak. Often called holly-oak.—Knee-holly, the butcher's-broom, Ruscus aculeatus.—Sea-holly, a plant, Eryngium maritimum.—Smooth holly. See Hedycarya.

holly², adv. An obsolete spelling of wholly.
Chaucer.

holly-fern (hol'i-fĕrn), n. The plant Aspidium Lonchitis.

hollyhock (hol'i-hok), n. [Formerly also holi-hock; < ME. holihoc, holihocce, holihole, lit. 'holy hock' or mallow: see holy and *hock*². It was so called, it is said, because brought from the Holy Land.] A plant, Althea rosea, of the natural order Malvaceae. It is a native of China and of southern Europe, and is a frequent ornament of gardens. There are many varieties, with single and double flowers, characterized by the tints of white, yellow, red, purple, and dark purple approaching to black. The leaves are said to yield a blue coloring matter not inferior to indigo.

Heavily hangs the hollyhock, Heavily hangs the tiger-lily.
Tennyson, A Spirit Haunts the Year's Last Hours.

hollyhock-rose (hol'i-hok-rōz), n. The resurrection-plant, Selaginella lepidophylla.

hollyhock-tree (hol'i-hok-trē), n. A hardy evergreen tree 12 to 20 feet high, Hibiscus splendens, a native of Queensland and New South Wales.

holly-laurel (hol'i-lā'rel), n. The islay, Prunus ilicifolia, of California.

holly-oak (hol'i-ōk), n. Same as holm-oak.

We saw Sir Walter where he stood,
Before a tower of crimson holly-oaks.
Tennyson, Princess, Conclusion.

hollyoak, n. A perverted form of hollyhock.

In October . . . come . . . roses cut or removed to come late, hollyoaks, and such like. Bacon, Gardens.

holly-rose (hol'i-rōz), n. A yellow-flowered West Indian shrub, Turnera ulmifolia: also applied to species of the genus Cistus.

holly-tree (hol'i-trē), n. Same as holly-hol.

holm¹ (hōlm or hōm), n. [Formerly sometimes written home; < ME. holm, a small island, also a river-meadow, also (only in Layamon) a hill, < AS. holm, an island in a river (so in late prose, the Chronicle, prob. by Scand. influence), usually (only in poetry) the sea, the ocean: a deflection, in ref. to the convex shape of the open sea, of the orig. sense (not recorded in AS.), 'a hill or mound' (cf. E. downs, lit. hills, similarly used); = OS. holm, a hill, = OLG. LG. holm, an island in a river, > Gr. holm, an island in a river, a hill, a dockyard, wharf (senses partly from Scand. ?), = Icel. holmr, holmr, also holms, an islet, esp. in a bay, creek, or river (even meadows on the shore with ditches behind them being so called), = Sw. holme, a small island, = Dan. holm, a holm, islet, dockyard; = L. culmen, culmen (with diff. term.), a mountain-top, summit, connected with collis, a hill, = E. hill.¹ *Holm*¹ is thus akin to *hill*¹: see culminate, column, hill, and holm. The Slavic forms, Oulg. hlümü, Serv. hum, um, Bohem. klum, Pol. kholm (barred l), Russ. kholm, etc., with Finnish kalm, Hung. halom, a hill, are prob. from the Teut. From this word are derived the surnames Holm, Holme, Home, Holmes, Holmer, Holman. Holm often occurs in place-names, as in Steeppholm, Flatholm, islands in the mouth of the Severn, Axholm, etc.] 1†. A hill. Layamon.—2. An islet or a river-island; in the Orkneys, a small island off a larger one.

Most of the numerous holms surrounding the Ris Island are small, and only rise a few feet above the water.
Nature, XXX. 220.

3. A river-meadow; a low flat tract of rich land by the side of a river.

Some call them the holmes, because they lie low, and are good for nothing but grass.
Harrison, Descrip. of England, p. 43. (Hallivell.)

Long may they [swans] float upon this flood serene;
Theirs be these holms untrodden, still, and green.
Wordsworth, Evening Walk.

The soft wind blowing over meadowy holms.
Tennyson, Edwin Morris.

holm² (hōlm or hōm), n. [< ME. holme, a corrupt form (appar. by some association with *holm*¹) of holen, holin, holly: see hollen, *holly*¹, and holm-oak.] 1. Holly.

The carver Holme; the Maple seedloom inward sound.
Spenser, F. Q., I. i. 9.

Beneath an holm-tree's friendly shade
Was Reason's little cottage made.
C. Smart, Reason and Imagination.

2. The holm-oak.

holm-cock (hōlm'kok), n. Same as holm-thrush.
holment, a. [< ME. holmen; < *holm*² + -en.] Pertaining to the holm; consisting of the wood of the holm.

Hee makes a shift to cut a holmen pole.
Sylvester, Maiden's Blush (trans.), l. 541.

holmium (hol'mi-um), n. Chemical symbol, Ho. A certain substance whose chemical properties have not been investigated, but which is assumed to be an elementary substance.

holm-oak (hōlm'ōk), n. [< *holm*² + oak: see *holm*² and holly-oak.] The evergreen oak, Quercus Ilex. Also called holly-oak.

holm-screech (hōlm'skrēch), n. Same as holm-thrush.

holm-thrush (hōlm'thrush), n. The missel-thrush, Turdus viscivorus. Also called holm-cock and holm-screech.

holo-. [NL., etc., holo-, < Gr. ὅλος, entire, complete in all its parts, whole, safe and sound, Ionic ὅλος, orig. δῆλος* = L. sollus, entire, complete (sol-idus, firm, solid), = Skt. sarva, all, whole; see solemn, solicit, solid. It should be noted that Gr. ὅλος has no connection with the equiv. and similar-seeming E. word whole (formerly spelled hole), by which it is commonly translated.] An element in compound words from the Greek, meaning 'entire, whole.'

holoblast (hol'ō-blast), n. [< Gr. ὅλος, whole, + βλαστός, germ.] In biol., a holoblastic ovum; an ovum the protoplasm of which is entirely germinal: distinguished from meroblast.

holoblastic (hol'ō-blas'tik), a. [< holoblast + -ic.] Wholly germinal: applied by Remak to those eggs in which the whole yolk is formative—that is, undergoes segmentation in development: opposed to meroblastic. Mammals, excepting monotremes, have holoblastic eggs. See cut under gastrulation.

Holobranchia (hol'ō-brang'ki-ä), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. ὅλος, whole, + βράγχια, gills: see branchiae.] 1. A group of fishes. Duméril, 1806.—2. In J. E. Gray's classification (1821), one of three orders of Saccophora or ascidians, distinguished from Tomobranchia and from Diphyllobranchia.

holocaust (hol'ō-kāst), n. [< ME. holocaust, < L. holocaustum, < Gr. ὅλοκαυστον, ὅλοκαυτος, a whole burnt-offering, neut. of ὅλοκαυστος, ὅλοκαυτος, burnt whole, < ὅλος, whole, + καυστός, καυτός, burnt, < καίω, burn: see caustic.] 1. A sacrifice or offering entirely consumed by fire, in use among the Jews and some pagan nations.

And therefore thus must the Jesuite do when an Ignatian Superior commands, or else he is no Holocaust for the Leilalan Altar.
Purchase, Pilgrimage, p. 171.

And she, thus left alone, might sooner prove
The perfect holocaust of generous love.
J. Beaumont, Psyche, xxiv. 194.

Eumenes cut a piece from every part of the victim, and by this he made it an holocaust, or an entire sacrifice.
W. Ervome.

2. Figuratively, a great slaughter or sacrifice of life, as by fire or other accident, or in battle.

Holocentridæ (hol'ō-sen'tri-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Holocentrus + -idæ.] A family of acanthopterygian fishes of the superfamily Berycoidea; the squirrel-fishes. The limits of the group vary with different writers. (a) In the old systems it was essentially coequal with the family Berycidae. (b) In a restricted sense, the Holocentridæ are fishes of oblong form with compressed head, ctenoid scales, narrow suborbitals, 8 branchiostegal rays, 2 dorsals, of which the spinous is longer than the soft one, and ventrals of 7 rays besides the spine. There are numerous (about 50) tropical species.

holocentroid (hol'ō-sen'troid), a. and n. [< Holocentrus + -oid.] 1. A. Of or relating to the Holocentridæ.

II. n. One of the Holocentridæ.

Holocentrus (hol'ō-sen'trus), n. [NL. (Bloch, 1790), < Gr. ὅλος, whole, + κέντρον, a point, the center.] The typical genus of the family Holocentridæ: so called because beset all over with spines. H. aeneus is a Floridian species, of bright-red fish color and great activity, and another is the squirrel-fish, H. erythraeus. See cut under Holocentridæ.

holocephal (hol'ō-sef'al), n. A fish of the genus Holocephalus. Also holocephale.

Holocephala (hol'ō-sef'a-lā), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl.: see holocephalus.] In Günther's system of classification, the Holocephali as an order of chondropterygian fishes, characterized by the single external gill-opening on each side.

Holocephali (hol'ō-sef'a-lī), n. pl. [NL., pl. of holocephalus*: see holocephalus.] A group of selachians to which different values have been given. (a) In the systems of Müller and others, an order of selachians or of chondropterygians, characterized by the continuity of the hyomandibular bone with the cranium. There is thus constituted an 'entire' or undivided cranium, with which the short lower jaw directly articulates, whence the name. The family Chimaeridae contains the only living species, but numerous extinct forms are known. (b) In some systems, raised to the rank of a subclass, but having the same limits as when used in an ordinal sense.

holocephalous (hol'ō-sef'a-lus), a. [< NL. holocephalus*, < Gr. ὅλος, whole, + κεφαλή, head.] Having an undivided cranium; specifically, of or pertaining to the Holocephali.

Holochlamyda (hol'ō-kla-mid'ä), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. ὅλος, whole, + χλαμύς, a mantle.] A sub-order of azygobranchiate gastropods, with the margin of the pallium or mantle simple or entire and the lip of the shell unnotched. There are many families, grouped as rhipidoglossate, ptenoglossate, and tænioglossate.

holochlamydate (hol'ō-kla-mid'ät), a. [As Holochlamyda + -atē.] Having the margin of the pallium or mantle simple or entire; of or pertaining to the Holochlamyda.

holochoanoid (hol'ō-kō'ā-noi'd), a. and n. [< Gr. ὅλος, whole, + χοάνη, a funnel, + εἶδος, form.] 1. a. Having complete septal funnels; of or pertaining to the Holochoanoida. Also holochoanoidal.

II. n. A member of the group Holochoanoida.
Holochoanoida (hol'ō-kō'ā-noi'dä), n. pl. [NL.: see holochoanoid.] A group of nautiloid cephalopods, in which the septal funnels close the intervals between the septa: contrasted with Elliphochoanoida. Hyatt, Proc. Bost. Soc. Nat. Hist., XXII. 260.

holochoanoidal (hol'ō-kō'ā-noi'dal), a. [< holochoanoid + -al.] Same as holochoanoid.

holochrone (hol'ō-kron), n. [< Gr. ὅλος, whole, + χρόνος, time.] In math., a curve such that if a heavy particle be restricted to move upon it, the times of descent through different portions are a given function of the arcs described.

holocryptic (hol'ō-krip'tik), a. [< Gr. ὅλος, whole, + κρυπτός, hidden: see crypt.] Wholly or effectively concealing; specifically, incapable of being read except by one who has the key, as a cipher.

holocrystalline (hol'ō-kris'tä-lin), a. [< holo- + crystalline.] Entirely crystalline: applied to rocks which contain no amorphous or glassy matter.

holodactylic (hol'ō-dak'til'ik), a. [< Gr. ὅλοδάρκνυλος, all dactylic, < ὅλος, whole, + δάκνυλος, a dactyl: see dactyl, dactylic.] In pros., consisting, with the exception of the last foot, entirely of dactyls: noting that form of the dactylic hexameter in which the last foot being always a spondee or trochee, all the other feet are dactyls. See hexameter.

hologastrula (hol'ō-gas'trō-lä), n.; pl. hologastrulae (-lë). [NL., < Gr. ὅλος, whole, + gastrula, q. v.] In embryol., the gastrula, of whatever form, of a holoblastic egg. It is an archigastrea if the segmentation of the yolk is equal as well as total; an amphigastrea if the segmentation is unequal and total. See gastrulation.

hologastrular (hol'ō-gas'trō-lär), a. [< hologastrula + -ar.] Resembling a hologastrula.

Holognatha (hō-log'nā-thä), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of holognathus*: see holognathous.] A section of terrestrial pulmoniferous gastropods, having an entire jaw: contrasted with Agnatha, Goniognatha, and Elasmognatha.

holognathous (hō-log'nā-thus), a. [< NL. holognathus*, < Gr. ὅλος, whole, + γνάθος, a jaw.] In conch., having the jaw of one piece; specifically, of or pertaining to the Holognatha.

holograph (hol'ō-gráf), a. and n. [< LL. holographus, < Gr. ὁλόγραφος, written wholly by the hand of the author, < ὅλος, whole, + γράφειν, write.] 1. a. Wholly written by the person in whose name it appears, as a manuscript document or letter.

A holograph letter by a man of quality is a true treasure.
Lamb, To Coleridge.

II. n. Any writing, as a letter, deed, testament, etc., wholly written by the person from whom it purports to proceed.

Let who says
"The soul's a clean white paper" rather say
A palimpsest, a prophet's holograph, Defiled, erased, and covered by a monk's.
Mrs. Browning, Aurora Leigh, i.

holographic (hol-ō-graf'ik), a. [holograph + -ic.] Relating to or of the nature of a holograph.

A regularly signed, sealed, and holographic act upon the points stated in the famous note.

Motley, Dutch Republic, I. 316.

holographical (hol-ō-graf'i-kal), a. [holographic + -al.] Same as holographic.

holohedral (hol-ō-hē'dral), a. [Gr. ὅλος, whole, + ἑδρα, seat, base.] In mineral., having all the similar edges or angles similarly replaced, as a crystal.—Holohedral isomorphism. See isomorphism.

holohedrim (hol-ō-hē'drizm), n. [holohedral + -ism.] In crystal., the property of having all the similar parts similarly modified, as a crystal, or of having all the planes of each form (see form, 2) present that are crystallographically possible—that is, all that have the same position with reference to the axes. The law of holohedrim is one of the fundamental principles of crystallography, but there are certain exceptions to it, which are noted under hemihedrim. Also holosymmetry.

holohemihedral (hol-ō-hem-i-hē'dral), a. [holo- + hemihedral.] In crystal., having all the planes present in half the octants: sometimes said of the inclined hemihedral forms of the isometric system. See hemihedrim.

Hololepta (hol-ō-lep'tā), n. [NL., < Gr. ὅλος, whole, + λεπτός, thin, fine, delicate.] A peculiar genus of clavicorn beetles, of the family Histeridae, of much-flattened form, with prominent mandibles. H. fossularis, a shining-black species, found beneath decaying bark in the eastern United States. Paykull.

Hololepta fossularis.

Holometabola (hol'ō-metab'ō-lā), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. ὅλος, whole, + E. metabola, q. v.] The series of hexapod or true insects which are holometabolic; the Aphaniptera, Diptera, Lepidoptera, Hymenoptera, Strepsiptera, Neuroptera, and Coleoptera. Also called Metabola.

holometabolian (hol-ō-met-a-bō'li-an), a. Same as holometabolic.

holometabolic (hol-ō-met-a-bol'ik), a. [As holometabol-y + -ic.] Undergoing complete metamorphosis or entire transformation, as an insect: the opposite of ametabolic: correlated with hemimetabolic. See holophanerous. Also holometabolian, holometabulous.

holometabolism (hol'ō-metab'ō-lizm), n. [As holometabol-y + -ism.] Same as holometaboly.

holometabolous (hol'ō-metab'ō-lus), a. [As holometabol-y + -ous.] Same as holometabolic.

holometaboly (hol'ō-metab'ō-ly), n. [Gr. ὅλος, whole, + μεταβολή, transformation] Complete or perfect metaboly; entire transformation or metamorphosis of an insect. Also holometabolism.

holometer (hō-lom'e-tēr), n. [Gr. ὅλος, whole, + μέτρον, measure.] A mathematical instrument for taking all kinds of measures, both on the earth and in the heavens; a pantometer.

holomorphic (hol-ō-mōr'fik), a. [As holomorph-y + -ic.] 1. Exhibiting holohedral symmetry.—2. In math., having the form of an entire function.—Holomorphic function, in math., a function which, being uniform over the whole range of quantity, is developable by Maclaurin's theorem for all values of the variable.

holomorphy (hol'ō-mōr-fi), n. [Gr. ὅλος, whole, + μορφή, form.] The character of being holomorphic.

Holomyaria (hol'ō-mī-ā'ri-ā), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. ὅλος, whole, + μύς, musele, + -aria.] One of the three principal divisions of Nematodea, containing those threadworms in which the muscles of the body-wall are not separated into series of muscle-cells. See Polymyaria, Meromyaria.

holomyarian (hol'ō-mī-ā'ri-an), a. Pertaining to or having the characters of the Holomyaria.

Holopodidae (hol'ō-pōd'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Holopodius + -idae.] A family of entomostracous crustaceans, typified by the genus Holopodius. The swimming-antennae are simple, elongated, cylindrical, and prehensile in the male, and there are two lateral dilatations of the intestine.

Holopodium (hol-ō-pē'di-um), n. [NL., < Gr. ὅλος, whole, + ποδῖον, the lower part of the foot.] The typical genus of Holopodiaceae.

holophanerous (hol-ō-fan'e-rus), a. [Gr. ὅλος, whole, + φαίνω, visible, < φαίνω, show, φαίνω, appear.] In zool., wholly visible or discernible, as the complete metamorphosis of certain insects.

holophotal (hol-ō-fō'tal), a. [Gr. ὅλος, whole, + φῶς, light.] The improved form of optical apparatus now used in lighthouses, by which practically all the light from the lamp or other source is made available for the desired effect of illumination. It may consist of mirrors to reflect the light (catoptric holophote), of lenses to refract it (dioptric holophote), or, better, of a combination of both reflection and refraction (catadioptric holophote).

When placed within a holophote, the electric lamp has already become a powerful auxiliary in effecting military operations both by sea and land.

C. W. Siemens, Pop. Sci. Mo., XXII. 62.

holophotometer (hol'ō-fō-tom'e-tēr), n. [Gr. ὅλος, whole, + φῶς, light.] The improved form of optical apparatus now used in lighthouses, by which practically all the light from the lamp or other source is made available for the desired effect of illumination. It may consist of mirrors to reflect the light (catoptric holophote), of lenses to refract it (dioptric holophote), or, better, of a combination of both reflection and refraction (catadioptric holophote).

When placed within a holophote, the electric lamp has already become a powerful auxiliary in effecting military operations both by sea and land.

C. W. Siemens, Pop. Sci. Mo., XXII. 62.

holophotic (hō-lof'ō-tik), a. [Gr. ὅλος, whole, + φῶς, light.] The improved form of optical apparatus now used in lighthouses, by which practically all the light from the lamp or other source is made available for the desired effect of illumination. It may consist of mirrors to reflect the light (catoptric holophote), of lenses to refract it (dioptric holophote), or, better, of a combination of both reflection and refraction (catadioptric holophote).

holophrasis (hō-lof'ō-rā-sis), n. [Gr. ὅλος, whole, + φράσις, expression: see phrase.] Holophrastic expression; combination of a complex of ideas and their signs into one word, especially a verb.

holophrastic (hol-ō-fras'tik), a. [Gr. ὅλος, whole, + φραστικός, suited for indicating or expressing, < φράζειν, indicate, show, tell: see phrase.] Having the force of a whole phrase, as a word or gesture; expressive of a sentence, or of a highly complex idea.

The main classes of words (the parts of speech) . . . into which the holophrastic ("equivalent to a whole phrase") utterances of a primitive time have by degrees become divided. W. D. Whitney, Life and Growth of Language, p. 209.

holophytic (hol-ō-fit'ik), a. [Gr. ὅλος, whole, + φυτόν, a plant.] Resembling closely an ordinary green plant in mode of nutrition: said of an animal, as an infusorian: correlated with saprophytic, and opposed to holozoic.

Holopidae (hō-lop'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Holopus + -idae.] Same as Holopodiidae.

holoplexia (hol-ō-plek'si-ā), n. [NL., < Gr. ὅλος, whole, + πλῆξις, a stroke, < πλήσσειν, strike: see apoplexy. Cf. hemiplegia.] Complete or general paralysis.

Why are we natural everywhere but in the pulpit? . . . Why this holoplexia on sacred occasions alone?

Sydney Smith, in Lady Holland, iii.

Holopodidae (hol-ō-pod'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Holopus + -idae.] A family of crinoids or sea-lilies, named from the genus Holopus. See Encrinuridae. Also written Holopidae.

Holoptilidae (hol-ō-til'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Holoptilus + -idae.] A family of hemipterous insects, of the suborder Heteroptera, named from the genus Holoptilus. The head is short and wide, the ocelli are remote, the second antennal joint is curved, and the posterior tibiae are plumose in the typical forms. They are natives of Australia, the East Indies, and Africa. Also written Holoptilidae.

Holoptilus (hō-lop'ti-lus), n. [NL., < Gr. ὅλος, whole, + πτερόν, feather, wing.] The typical genus of Holoptilidae.

holoptychian (hol-ōp'tik'i-an), a. Of or relating to, or containing, Holoptychius: said of a geological deposit characterized by remains of the genus Holoptychius.

Holoptychiidae (hol-ōp'ti-k'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Holoptychius + -idae.] A family of polypetroid fishes, of the subclass Ganoidei, named from the genus Holoptychius. They have thick, sculptured or corrugated, rounded ganoid scales; the head covered with large plates; the dendrodont teeth large, hard, and conical; the dorsal fins two in number; and the pectorals and ventrals lobate. They flourished during the Devonian and Carboniferous periods, and are all extinct; the species were of large size, sometimes attaining a length of 12 feet. Also Holoptychidae.

Holoptychius (hol-ōp'tik'i-us), n. [NL., < Gr. ὅλος, whole, + πτεχὴ or πτεῖς (πτύχ-), a fold.] The typical genus of Holoptychiidae: so called from the wrinkled enamel-scales. The teeth are of two kinds, small ones in closely set rows and larger ones distant from one another; but all are infolded and have numerous fissures radiating from the central mass of vasodentine which fills up the pulp-cavity. Species occur in the Old Red Sandstone. H. nobilissimus is an example. L. Agassiz.

Holopus (hol'ō-pus), n. [NL., < Gr. ὅλος, whole, + ποῦς (ποδ-) = E. foot.] A notable genus of fixed living crinoids, of the family Comatulidae, having a broad base without true stalk, 10 spirally rolled arms, and a radial asymmetry in which a bivium and a trivium are recognizable. D'Orbigny, 1837.

holorhinal (hol-ō-rī'nāl), a. [Gr. ὅλος, whole, + ῥίς (ῥιν-), the nose.] In ornith., having the nasal bones only slightly or not at all cleft. A. H. Garrod.

A bird having the [nasal] bones with moderate forking, so that the angle of the fork, bounding the nostrils behind, does not reach so far back as the fronto-premaxillary suture, is termed holorhinal. Coues, Key to N. A. Birds, p. 165.

holosericeous (hol'ō-sē-rish'ius), a. [Gr. ὅλος, whole, + σερικός, of silk, < σῆκος, whole, < σῆκος, of silk: see silk and sericeous.] Cf. LL. holosericeus. 1. In bot., covered with minute silky hairs, discovered better by the touch than by sight.

—2. In entom., covered with short, fine, shining appressed hairs, giving the surface an appearance like that of satin.

holosiderite (hol-ō-sid'e-rit), n. [Gr. ὅλος, whole, + σίδηρος, iron: see siderite.] A meteorite consisting entirely of metallic iron.

Holosphina (hol'ō-si-fō'nā), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. ὅλος, whole, + σίφω, a tube, pipe: see siphon.] An order of Cephalopoda named from the completely tubular siphon: opposed to Schizosphina, and a synonym of Dibranchiata.

holosphonate (hol-ō-si-fō'nāt), a. [As Holosphina + -ate.] Having the siphon completely tubular; of or pertaining to the Holosphina.

holospondaic (hol'ō-spon-dā'ik), a. [Gr. ὅλος, whole, + σπῶνδαιος, all of spondaes, < ὅλος, whole, + σπῶνδαιος (sc. ποῖς), a spondee: see spondee.] In pros., consisting entirely of spondaes: noting that form of the dactylic hexameter in which all six places are occupied by spondaes instead of dactyls. See hexameter.

holost (hol'ost), n. [NL. Holostei.] A fish of the group Holostei.

holostean (hō-lost'e-an), a. and n. I. a. Of or pertaining to the Holostei.

II. n. One of the Holostei.

Holostei (hō-lost'e-i), n. pl. [NL. (J. Müller, 1844), pl. of "holosteus": see holosteus.] A group of ganoid fishes which have the skeleton osseous instead of cartilaginous: distinguished from Chondrostei. By Müller and others it was regarded as an order, while by some it has been ranked as a suborder. Later writers have discarded it as being too heterogeneous. It embraced the orders now known as Rhomboidae, Cyclozanoidae, and Crossopterygii among recent forms, and representatives of several extinct orders. The living representatives of the group are the bony pikes or gars and the mudfishes (Lepidosteus, Amia, etc.).

holosteous (hō-lost'e-us), a. [NL. holosteus*, < Gr. ὅλος, whole, + ὀστέον, a bone.] Entirely bony; having an osseous skeleton: specifically applied to the fishes classed as Holostei.

holosteric (hol-ō-ster'ik), a. [Gr. ὅλος, whole, + στερεός, solid.] Completely solid: said of certain instruments used in barometry in which no liquid is employed, as an aneroid.

Holosteum (hō-lost'e-um), n. [NL., lit. "all bony" (so called by antiphrasis, the plant being soft and delicate), < L. holosteum, < Gr. ὀστέον, a certain plant, < ὅλος, whole, all, + ὅστέον, bone.] A small genus of dicotyledonous poly-petalous plants, of the natural order Caryophyllaceae, tribe Alsineae, allied very closely to the genus Cerastium, the mouse-ear chickweed, from which it differs in having dorsally compressed seeds fixed by their face, and umbelliform cymes. The flowers have 5 sepals, 5 denticulate or emarginate petals, 3 to 5, rarely 10, hypogynous stamens, and a 1-celled ovary with 3, rarely 4 to 5, styles. Three species are known, natives of temperate Europe and Asia. H. umbellatum, the jagged chickweed, has become naturalized in the eastern United States.

Holostomata (hōl-ōs'tōm'-tā), n. pl. [NL. (Fleming, 1823), neut. pl. of holostomatus*: see holostomatous.] 1. A division of pectinibranchiate gastropodous mollusks, with shells having the mouth entire, and not notched or prolonged into a siphon: opposed to Siphonostomata. It was formed to include such families as Turbinidae, Vermetidae, Littorinidae, etc., now referred to different orders. Some are known as sea-snails. There are upward of 12 families, even after eliminating some, as the chitons and tooth-shells, that used to be included. These families are mostly tenebriolossate, but some, as the Ianthinidae and Scalaridae, are ptenoglossate.

2. In Infusoria, same as Pantostomata. S. Kent, 1877.

holostomate (hōl-ōs'tō-māt), a. [NL. holostomatus*: see holostomatous.] Same as holostomatous.

The holostomate (entire-mouthed) forms.

Stand. Nat. Hist., I. 339.

holostomatous (hōl-ōs'tōm'-a-tus), a. [NL. holostomatus*, < Gr. ὅλος, whole, + στόμα(τ-), mouth.] Having the mouth entire. (a) Having the mouth not notched or canalliculate: specifically said of the Holostomata: opposed to siphonostomatous. (b) Having all the usual parts of the mouth.

holostome (hōl-ōs'tōm), n. 1. In conch., one of the Holostomata.—2. In ichth., an apodal fish of the group Holostomi.

Holostomi (hōl-ōs'tō-mī), n. pl. [NL. pl. of holostomus*: see holostomatous.] A group of fishes including eel-like forms which differ from true eels in having all the bones usually bounding the mouth—that is, well-developed intermaxillary as well as supramaxillary bones. It includes the families Symbranchidae and Amphipnoidae. By some ichthyologists it is ranked as an order and by others as a suborder of Apodes or Symbranchia.

holostomous (hōl-ōs'tō-mus), a. [NL. holostomus*, < Gr. ὅλος, whole, + στόμα, mouth.] Same as holostomatous; specifically, in ichth., pertaining to or having the characters of the Holostomi.

holosymmetric (hōl-ō-si-met'rik), a. [< holosymmetry + -ic.] Holohedral.

holosymmetry (hōl-ō-sim'e-trī), n. [< holo + symmetry.] Same as holohedrim.

holothecal (hōl-ō-thē'kal), a. [< Gr. ὅλος, whole, + θέκη, case, + -al.] In ornith., having the tarsal envelop whole or entire—that is, not divided into scutella or reticulations; booted; having greaves: opposed to schizothecal. See cut under booted.

Holothrix (hōl-ō-thriks), n. [NL. so called in allusion to the long petals, < Gr. ὅλος, whole, + θρίξ (τρίχ-), a hair.] A genus of monocotyledonous plants, of the natural order Orchideae, tribe Ophrydeae, having the sepals subequal, the petals and lip long and erect, and the flowers arranged in a thin spike or dense, and all directed to one side. They are small herbs with the general habits of Herminium, having one or two leaves at the base of the erect stem. Eighteen species are known, of which two are natives of Abyssinia, all the rest being South African. The genus is the type of Lindley's tribe Holothricae.

holothure (hōl-ō-thūr), n. A holothurian.

Holothuria¹ (hōl-ō-thū'ri-ā), n. [NL., fem.: see holothurium.] 1. A genus of sea-slugs, typical of the family Holothuriidae. There are various species, some of them edible, as H. argus or edulis, known as bêche-de-mer and trepang.

2. [L. c.] An individual of this genus.

Holothuria² (hōl-ō-thū'ri-ā), n. pl. [NL., pl. of holothurium, neut., for Holothuria, fem.: see holothurium.] The sea-cucumbers, holothurians, or Holothuriidae. Thus, in Cuvier's system of classification, the Holothuria are the third family of pedicellate echinoderms.

Holothuria³ (hōl-ō-thū'ri-ā), n. pl. [NL., pl. of *holothuria*¹.] Same as *Holothuria*². As thus named in Leuckart's system, the holothurians were an order of his Scylozoa, contrasted with Sipunculiidae or spoonworms.

holothurian (hōl-ō-thū'ri-an), n. and a. [< *Holothuria*¹ + -an.] 1. n. One of the Holothuriidae; a sea-cucumber, sea-slug, trepang, or bêche-de-mer. They have been directly divided into several sections, to which the terms (derived from De Blainville, 1834) vermiform, ascidiform, veretilliform, cucumiform, and sipunculiform have been applied.

The Holothurian or "sea-cucumber" has a wonderful power of changing its form. It elongates, contracts, enlarges at each end while it is small in the middle, and thus changes its appearance from time to time. In its power of going to pieces it almost excels the "brittle star" and the starfish, Luidia. Pop. Sci. Mo., XIII. 327.

II. a. Pertaining to or having the characters of the Holothuriidae.

Holothuridea (hōl-ō-thū'ri-dē-ā), n. pl. Same as Holothuriidae.

Holothuriidae (hōl-ō-thū'ri-i-dē-ā), n. pl. [NL., < *Holothuria*¹ + -iidae.] A restricted family of holothurians, represented by the genus Holothuria. See *Holothuria*¹.

Holothurioidea (hōl-ō-thū'ri-oi-dē-ā), n. pl. [NL., < *Holothuria*¹ + -oidea.] A class, order, or other group of Echinodermata; the sea-slugs, sea-cucumbers, or trepangs. They have an elongate, vermiform shape, and display little tendency to radiation in structure except at the oral end. They have a tough leathery integument instead of a hard calcareous test as in other echinoderms (though the skin may include hard spicules of various shapes), an oral cirlet of tentacles, and a calcareous ring of several pieces round the mouth. There are two types of Holothuriidae, represented respectively by the genera Synapta and Holothuria, and forming two orders. The former, known as Apoda, Apodia, Apneumona, are hermaphrodite, with a reduced water-vascular system, no special respiratory apparatus, and no Cuvierian organs. The latter, called Poda, Dipneumona, or Pneumonophora, have a sexes distinct, a respiratory tree, Cuvierian organs, and a developed water-vascular system including ambulacral feet. Also Holothuriidae and several other forms.

Development of Holothurians.

A, B, C, Holothuria. A, echinopod stage, or auricularia; g, dorsal pore; h, ambulacral sac. B, Later stage; c, intestine; g, dorsal pore; f, prolongation of circular ambulacral vessel; i, wheel-shaped calcareous body. C, young holothuria with circular ciliated bands; g, madreporic canal; f, Polian vesicle. D, E, F, Synapta. D, echinopod larva with bilateral ciliated band, and wheel-shaped calcareous body, ventral view; g, mouth and gullet; h, stomach; c, intestine and anus; d, sausage-shaped sacs of enterocoele; e, rudiment of ambulacral vascular system. E, pupa-stage of the same, with obsolete oral aperture and zonal cilia; i, tentacles; h, Polian vesicle; f, longitudinal muscles of perisoma. F, young synapta without cilia, with fine tentacles, and several of the wheel-shaped bodies at posterior end of body; m, madreporic canal.

holothurium (hōl-ō-thū'ri-um), n.; pl. holothuria (-ā). [L. holothurium, < Gr. ὁλοθούριον, neut., a kind of zoöphyte, appar. < ὅλος, whole, + θούριος, θούπος, rushing, raging, impetuous.] 1. A kind of zoöphyte mentioned by Aristotle and Pliny.—2. A sea-cucumber; a holothurian.

Holothurioida (hōl-ō-thū'roi-dē-ā), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. ὅλος, whole, + θουριόειδής, like a door, < θύρα, = E. door, + εἶδος, form.] In Gegenbaur's system of classification, a class of echinoderms, divided into the orders Eupodia and Apodia, the latter containing Synapta and Chirodota.

Holothuriidae (hōl-ō-thū'ri-dē-ā), n. pl. Same as *Holothuria*¹.

Holotricha (hōl-ōt'ri-kā), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. ὅλος, whole, + θρίξ (τρίχ-), a hair.] An order of free-swimming infusorians, more or less completely ciliate throughout. The cilia differ but slightly one from another, and are sometimes supplemented by a variously modified extensible or undulating membrane. The oral and anal orifices are especially conspicuously developed. The cuticular layer or ectoplasm not infrequently contains trichocysts. The order is contrasted with Heterotricha, Hypotricha, and Peritricha.—Holotricha atomata, a suborder of free-swimming animalcules, more or less completely and evenly ciliate throughout, and possessing no oral aperture.

holotrichous (hōl-ōt'ri-kus), a. [< Holotricha + -ous.] Pertaining to or having the characters of the Holotricha; having similar cilia over all the body. See Paramecium.

Holotrocha (hōl-ōt'ro-kā), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. ὅλος, whole, + τροχός, a wheel.] A superfamily of Rotifera or wheel-animalcules, containing such as have an anus and one entire trochal disk. Ehrenberg, 1838.

holotrochous (hōl-ōt'ro-kus), a. [< Holotrocha + -ous.] Pertaining to or having the characters of the Holotrocha; having the trochal disk entire.

holourit, n. See *holer*².

holozoic (hōl-ō-zō'ik), a. [< Gr. ὅλος, whole, + ζωικός, animal, < ζῷον, an animal.] Entirely—like an animal in mode of nutrition; not holophytic nor saprophytic: said of some infusorians.

All [ciliate infusorians] are holozoic in their nutrition, though some are said to combine with this saprophytic and holophytic nutrition. Encyc. Brit., XIX. 861.

holpt, holpen (hōlp, hōl'pn). The antiquated preterit and past participle of help.

holsm, a. An early spelling of wholesome. Chaucer.

holster (hōl'stēr), n. [< D. holster, a pistol-case, holster, also a soldiers' knapsack, = AS. heolster, a covering, veil, hiding-place, = Icel. hulstr, a case, = Sw. hölster, sheath, = Dan. hulster, a case, covering, holster, = Goth. hulstr, a veil; with suffix -ster, from the verb represented by AS. hulian*, ME. hulien, hulen, hylene, hullen, hüllen, E. dial. *hull*², *hull*², cover, = D. hullen = Icel. hýlja = Dan. hýlle = Sw. hölja = Goth. huljan, cover, from the same ult. root as *hole*¹, *hollow*¹, *hell*¹, *heal*², etc.] The G. holfter, also hulfter (sometimes halfter, by confusion with halfter = E. *halter*²), a holster, takes this particular meaning from the D.; MHG. hulfter, a quiver, < hulft, a cover, case, sheath, and perhaps Goth. hulviftrjos, pl., a coffin, are akin.] A leathern case for a pistol. Holsters were formerly, and are still sometimes, carried by horse-men or cavaliers attached to the saddle, one on each side of the pommel; but they are now more commonly worn on the belt.

In th' holsters, at the saddle-bow,

Two aged pistols he did stow.

S. Butler, Hudibras, I. i. 391.

Our Greek jerked both pistols from his holsters, and fired them into the air. B. Taylor, Lands of the Saracen, p. 67.

holstered (hōl'stērd), a. [< holster + -ed².] Bearing holsters.

holster-pipe (hōl'stēr-pīp), n. That part of a holster which projects downward and receives the barrel of the pistol.

holt¹ (hōlt), n. [ME. holt, < AS. holt, a wood, grove, copse, rarely of wood as timber (L. lignum), = OS. holt = OFries. holt = D. hout = MLG. LG. holt = OHG. MHG. G. holz = Icel. holt = Odan. holt, a wood, grove, more commonly of wood as timber; prob. = Ir. caill, coill, a wood, = OBulg. klada, Bohem. klada = Serv. klada = Pol. klada (barred l) = Russ. koloda, dial. kalda = Lith. kalada = Lett. kalota, a block, log (of wood).] A wood or woodland; a grove, an orchard. Now seldom used except in poetry or in provincial English, but occurring in an element or alone in many English place-names, and in surnames derived from them.

These brides songen though the holtes full of grene leves. Merrill (E. E. T. S.), II. 274.

The winde in hoults and shady greaves A murmur makes among the boughes and leaves. Fairfax, tr. of Tasso's Godfrey of Boulogne, III. 6.

Come a vapour from the margin, blackening over heath and holt. Tennyson, Locksley Hall.

The boldest shrank from the dark holts and pools that broke the desolate moorland. J. R. Green, Conq. of Eng., p. 54.

holt² (hōlt), n. [E. dial., appar. for hold, and this, as *hold*³, for *hole*¹, q. v.] A hole; a burrow; specifically, a deep hole in a river for the protection of fish. [Prov. Eng.]

The otter works upwards to the surface of the earth, and forms . . . several holts, or lodges, that in case of high floods it may have a retreat, for no animal affects lying drier. Pennant, Brit. Zool., The Otter.

holt⁴. A contracted form of holdeth, third person singular present indicative of *hold*¹. Chaucer.

Holtz machine. See electric machine, under electric.

holus-bolus (hōl'us-bō'lus), adv. [A varied redupl. of whole, in sham-Latin form, like hocus-pocus; prob. formed without ref. to bolus, a large pill, as usually explained.] All at a gulp; altogether; all at once: as, he swallowed it holus-bolus. [Colloq., Eng.]

She appeared to lose all command over herself, and making a sudden snatch at the heap of silver, put it back holus-bolus in her pocket. W. Collins, Moonstone, I. 15.

holus-bolus (hō' lus-bō' lus), n. [See holus-bolus, adv.] The whole; all, taken collectively; as, he drove out the holus-bolus of them. [Colloq., Eng.]

holwer, a. An obsolete variant of hollow.
Chaucer.

holy (hō' li), a. and n. [Early mod. E. also holie; < ME. holij, holi, halig, < AS. hālig = OS. hēlig = OFries. hēlich = D. heilig = OHG. heilag, MHG. heilce, G. heilig = Icel. heilagr, contr. helgir = Sw. helig = Dan. hellig (not in Goth.), holy, sacred; prob. not a mere extension of the primitive adj., AS. hāl, ME. hole, E. whole, but rather formed, with adj. suffix -ig, E. -y, from AS. hæl (orig. hāls*), hælu, hælo, f. From the early form of holy are derived *hallow*1, n., a saint, and *hallow*1, v., sanctify. In holiday, holyhock, holibut or halibut, and halidom, holy exists in a slightly altered or in its older form.]
I. a. 1. Consecrated; set apart for religious use or uses; of sacred or religious character or quality: as, the holy priesthood; the holy sabbath; holy oil; holy thoughts.

Put off thy shoes from off thy feet, for the place whereon thou standest is holy ground. Ex. iii. 5.

Give not that which is holy unto the dogs, neither cast ye your pearls before swine. Mat. vii. 6.

And made there the precious sacrament of his blessyd body that we dayly vse at his holy autler, in memorye of the same. Sir R. Gwyforye, Pylgrimage, p. 21.

They whilome used holy euerie day
Their service and their holie things to say.
Spenser, Mother Hub. Tale, l. 450.

An evil soul producing holy witness
Is like a villain with a smiling cheek.
Shak., M. of V., i. 3.

2. Perfect in religious character and the practices of devotion; sanctified; saintly.

That holy man Ioseph of Armathia came vnto Pylate and asked of hym the body of our sayour Ihesu cryste.
Joseph of Arimathe (E. E. T. S.), p. 27.

Herod feared John, knowing that he was a just man and an holy. Mark vi. 20.

Far be it from me, however, to condemn all those good and holy persons who have betaken themselves to this solitary and austere course of living.

Ep. Atterbury, Sermons, I. x.

3. Exhibiting, indicating, or befitting sanctity of life; devout; righteous.

Hence a demeanour holy and unspeck'd,
And the world's hatred, as its sure effect.
Couper, Truth, l. 281.

The King was shaken with holy fear;
"The Gods," he said, "would have chosen well."
Tennyson, The Victim.

Holy Alliance, a league formed by the sovereigns of Russia, Austria, and Prussia in person after the fall of Napoleon, signed at Paris, September 26th, 1815, and afterward joined by all the other European sovereigns except those of Rome and England. Its professed object was to unite their respective governments in a Christian brotherhood, but its real one was to perpetuate existing dynasties by their joint opposition to all attempts at change. A special clause debarred any member of the Bonaparte family from ascending a European throne. The league came to an end after the French revolution of 1830.—Holy bread. (a) The bread used for the eucharist; a piece of such bread; an altar-bread; in the Gr. Ch., same as holy loaf or holy lamb. 2. pl. Sacred rites; devotions.

In Pegu there is a Varelle or Temple, like to this, which the King frequented to doe his holies therein. Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 468.

3. A place of worship; a sacred place.

The Earth was their Goddess: to their holies they admitted nothing female, nor to their tables. Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 351.

Holy of holies. [ME. hōli of halowes (haleues); tr. LL. sanctum sanctorum.] (a) The inner or western division of the Jewish tabernacle, as distinguished from the outer part, called the holy place. The holy of holies was inclosed on three sides by the walls of the tabernacle, while on the fourth or eastern side a veil, ornamented with figures of cherubim, and suspended from four pillars of shittim-wood overlaid with gold, separated it from the holy place (Ex. xxvi. 31; xxxvi. 35). The holy of holies was a perfect cube in its dimensions, the length, breadth, and height being each ten cubits. In it stood the ark of the testament, or ark of the covenant, of shittim-wood overlaid with gold. Upon the ark was the capreth or golden mercy-seat, the place of the divine presence (Ex. xxv. 22), and on the capreth were two cherubim, also of gold, both facing toward its center. No one but the high priest entered the holy of holies, and he only once a year, on the Day of Atonement (Lev. xvi.). Also called the most holy place and the oracle.

The type of Christ in some one particular, as of entering yearly into the Holy of holies, and such like, rested upon the High Priest only as more immediately personating our Saviour. Milton, Church-Government, i. 5.

(b) The sanctuary or bema of a Christian church: used especially by the Greek and other Oriental churches. (c) Among the Nestorians, a small recess at the east end of a church, containing nothing but a cross. No one, not even the priest, is allowed to enter it.

holy, v. t. [holy, a. See *hallow*1, the older verb.] To canonize. Davies.

Harp. I hug thee
For drilling thy quick brains in this rich plot

Homaliæ (hom-ā-lī-ē-ō), n. pl. [NL., < Homalium + -æ.] A tribe of plants belonging to the natural order Samydaceæ, typified by the genus Homalium.

They are characterized by alternate, rarely opposite or verticillate, leaves; the calyx free or adnate to the ovary; and 4 to 15-merous flowers. The series Homaliæ of Baillon (1873) was referred to the Bixniæ.

Homalium (hō-mā-lī-um), n. [NL. (orig. Omalium, Gravenhorst, 1802), < Gr. ὁμός, even, level, smooth, < ὁμός, the same: see homo-.] 1. In zool., a genus of rove-beetles, of the family Staphylinidæ, of wide distribution and many species, which live upon plants or under the bark of trees.

—2. In bot., a large genus of dicotyledonous polypetalous shrubs or trees, founded by Jacques (1763), of the natural order Samydeaceae, and type of the tribe Homalioideae. It is characterized by having the ovary more or less adnate to the calyx, and the petals as numerous as the sepals, and plane. The leaves are alternate, petioled, ovate or lanceolate, and crenate or serrate, rarely entire; the flowers are small and disposed in branching axillary panicles. About 30 species are known, natives of Asia, Africa, northern Australia, the Fiji Islands, and tropical America.

Homalium diffusum.

Homalognatæ (hom'-a-lō-gon'-a-tē), n. pl. [NL., fem. pl. of homalognatus: see homalognatus.] A division of birds proposed by Garrod, to include all those which possess a certain muscle of the leg, the ambiens: opposed to Anomalognatæ.

homalognatous (hom'-a-lō-gon'-a-tus), a. [NL., homalognatus, < Gr. homalós, even, level, equal, + gōv = E. knee.] In ornith., provided with an ambiens muscle.

Passerers have no ambiens: . . . birds having it are termed homalognatous or "normally-kneed"; . . . those wanting it are called anomalognatous.

Coues, Key to N. A. Birds, p. 195.

Homalogrya (hom'-a-lō-jī'-rā), n. [NL., < Gr. homalós, even, level, equal, + gryōs, a ring, circle.] A genus of gastropods, typical of the family Homalogryidae.

Homalogryidæ (hom'-a-lō-jī'-rī-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Homalogrya + -idæ.] A family of gastropods, typified by the genus Homalogrya. The animal has no tentacles; it has sessile eyes, and a very peculiar radula, the central tooth having a quadrangular base and triangular cusp, the lateral and marginal teeth being represented by a single oblong transverse plate; the shell is planorbiform; and the operculum is corneous and has a central nucleus. Only one small species, Homalogrya nitida, of the European seas, is known.

homaloidal (hom'-a-lōi'-dal), a. [< Gr. homalós, even, level, + eidós, form, + -al.] In geom., similar to a plane; flat; having real points at all real distances, but none at imaginary distances. —Homaloidal system, a system of lines on a plane representing another surface; also, a system of surfaces such that every three cut in a single point.

Homalomyia (hom'-a-lō-mī'-i-ā), n. [NL., < Gr. homalós, even, level, equal, + myia, a fly; see Musca.] A genus of flies founded by Bouché in 1834, distinguished from Anthomyia by the narrower cheeks, more rounded head, and less hairy abdomen. The larvae are found in moist decaying matter, both animal and vegetable; they breathe by lateral branchie. Numerous cases are on record of the voiding of these larvae from the intestines of human beings, but in such cases they have probably entered the body in over-ripe fruit or vegetable.

a, larva of Homalomyia (line shows natural size); b, spiny hair, magnified.

Homaloptera (hom'-a-lōp'-te-rā), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of homalopterus*: see homalopterus.] An order of insects, corresponding to the suborder Pupipara of Diptera. Leach, 1817.

homalopterous (hom'-a-lōp'-te-rus), a. [NL., homalopterus*, < Gr. homalós, even, level, + πτερόν, wing.] Pertaining to the Homaloptera.

homalosternal (hom'-a-lō-stēr'-nal), a. [< Gr. homalós, even, level, + stérnon, sternum.] Flat, as a breast-bone; having a keelless sternum; ratite, as a bird.

Homalosternii (hom'-a-lō-stēr'-ni-i), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. homalós, even, level, + stérnon, sternum.] One of the primary divisions of recent birds, including all those in which the breast-bone is not keeled or carinate; the Struthionæ or Ratitæ: opposed to Tropidosternii. [Little used.]

Homaridæ (hō-mar'-ī-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Homarus + -idæ.] A family of macrurous crustaceans, containing the lobsters of the genera Homarus and Nephrops.

homarine (hom'-a-rin), a. and n. [< Homarus + -inæ.] I. A. Resembling a lobster, or having the characteristics of a lobster. Huxley.

II. n. A lobster.

A marine Astacine or a true Homarine.

Huxley, Crayfish, p. 318.

Homarus (hom'-a-rus), n. [NL., < OF. homar, mod. F. homard, Norm. houmar, < LG. hummer (> G. hummer) = Sw. Dan. hummer, OSw. homare = Icel. humarr, lobster; cf. Gr. κάμαρος, κάμαρος, > L. cammarus, gammarrus, a kind of lobster.] A genus of long-tailed crustaceans or lobsters, belonging to the family Homaridæ. There are three species, H. americanus, vulgaris, and cappensis, of North America, Europe, and Africa respectively. In spite of the large size and general appearance, the species of Homarus are related to the crawfish (Astacus and Cambarus) and are usually placed in Astacidae, but differ in being marine. Milne-Edwards.

homatonic (hom'-a-tom'-ik), a. [< Gr. hōmē, the same, in comp. together, + E. atonic.] Composed of atoms of the same kind.

homatropia (hom'-a-trō'-pi-ā), n. [NL., < Gr. hōmē, the same, in comp. together, + NL. atropia.] Same as homatropic.

homatropine (hō-mat'-rō-pin), n. [< Gr. hōmē, the same, in comp. together, + E. atropine.] An alkaloid (C₁₆H₂₁NO₃) crystallizing in colorless prisms which are deliquescent, but difficultly soluble in water. It is derived from atropine, an alkaloid prepared from belladonna. Salts of homatropine are used to some extent in medicine.

Homaxonia (hom'-ak-sō'-ni-ā), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. hōmē, the same, + ἀξων, an axle: see ax², axis, azle.] In morphology, organic forms all of whose axes are equal: correlated with Protaxonia.

homaxonal (hom'-ak-sō'-ni-al), a. [As Homaxonia + -al.] Having all the axes equal; specifically, of or pertaining to the Homaxonia.

All questions of symmetry, for which Haeckel's nomenclature of homaxonal, homopoleic, &c., is distinctly preferable. Encyc. Brit., XVI. 845.

homaxonic (hom'-ak-son'-ik), a. [As Homaxonia + -ic.] Same as homaxonal.

A spherical (homaxonic) or cone-shaped (monaxonic) perforated shell of membranous consistence known as the central capsule, and probably homologous with the perforated shell of a Globigerina.

E. R. Lankester, Encyc. Brit., XIX. 849.

hombre (om'-br), n. Same as ombr. [Rare.]
home (hōm), n. and a. [< ME. home, hoom, hom, ham, < AS. hām, a home, dwelling, = OS. Homicide in its largest sense is generic, embracing every mode by which the life of one man is taken by the act of another. Shaw, Ch. J. It includes suicide, and also death caused by culpable neglect. In law homicide is usually classed as justifiable, excusable, and felonious; justifiable, when it proceeds from necessity, as where the proper officer inflicts capital punishment, where an officer of justice kills an offender who assaults or resists him and who cannot otherwise be captured, or where persons are killed in the dispersion of rebellious or riotous assemblies, or for the prevention of some atrocious crime; excusable, when it happens from misadventure, as where a man in doing a lawful act, without any intention of hurt, kills another by accident, or in self-defense, or in defense of wife, children, parent, servant, etc. (also called homicide by misadventure); felonious, when it proceeds from malice, or is done in the prosecution of some unlawful act, or in a sudden passion, or it may be by criminal neglect. Felonious homicide comprehends murder and manslaughter. In Scots law manslaughter is called culpable homicide.

homicidy, n. An obsolete variant of *homicide*². Chaucer.

homiculture (hom'i-kul-tūr), n. [< L. homo, man, + cultura, culture.] The physical improvement of the human race by means analogous to those used in improving the breed of the lower animals. [Rare.]

Indirectly, then, marriages are frequently made on bases which, if not those that the laws of Homiculture would lay down, are at least not diametrically opposed to them.

Nineteenth Century, XXIV, 391.

homiform (hom'i-fôrm), a. [< L. homo, man, + forma, shape.] Same as hominiform. Cudworth.
homilete (hom'i-lét), n. [< Gr. ὁμιλητής, a companion, scholar, hearer, < ὁμιλεῖν, be in company, consort, converse; see homiletic. The E. sense is taken from homiletic, after the analogy of exegete, exegetic.] One who composes or delivers homilies or sermons; one versed in the art of preaching. [Rare.]

The pulpit wants above all else enthusiastic homiletes.
Presbyterian Quarterly, January, 1876, p. 120.

homiletic (hom-i-lét'ik), a. [< Gr. ὁμιλικός, of conversation, affable, conversable, < ὁμιλεῖν, be in company, consort or converse, < ὁμιλος, an assembly, throng; see homily.] 1. Same as homiletical, 1.—2. In the style or of the nature of a homily or a sermon; hortatory; expository.

This [the Ormulum] is a metrical paraphrase of a part of the New Testament, in a homiletic form, and it probably belongs to the early part of the thirteenth century.

G. P. Marsh, Lects. on Eng. Lang., v.

The ecclesiastical literature is all historical, homiletic, or devotional.

D. M. Wallace, Russia, p. 433.

3. Of or pertaining to sermons or to homilies; pertaining to preaching or the art of preaching.

—Homiletic theology. Same as homiletics.
homiletical (hom-i-lét'ik-al), a. [< Homiletic + -al.] 1. Pertaining to familiar intercourse; conversable; companionable.

His virtues active chiefly, and homiletical, not those lazy virtue ones of the cloister.

Bp. Atterbury, Character of Luther.

2. Same as homiletic, 2.
The Sermon of Pentecost is made the basis of further homiletical hints.

Bibliotheca Sacra, XLV, 740.

homiletics (hom-i-lét'iks), n. [Pl. of homiletic; see -ics. Cf. Gr. ὁμιλική (se. τέχνη), the art of conversation.] The art of preaching; that branch of practical theology which treats of the composition and delivery of sermons and other religious discourses.

homiliarium (hom'i-lī-ā-ri-um), n.; pl. homiliaria (-ā). [ML., also homilarius (se. liber) and homiliare, < homilia, a homily; see homily.] A homiliary for the use of pastors.

homiliary (hom'i-lī-ā-ri), n.; pl. homiliaries (-iz). [< ML. homiliarium, homilarius; see homiliarium.] A book containing a collection of homilies or sermons to be read on Sundays and other days.

homilist (hom'i-list), n. [< homily + -ist.] One who composes homilies; one who exhorts.

Novelists have enforced moral lessons more powerful than a wilderness of homilists.

Quarterly Rev., CLXIII, 64.

homilistical (hom-i-lis'ti-kal), a. [< Homilist + -ic-al.] Pertaining to or characteristic of a homilist.

These were the grand Divines in all Times and Places, not superficially armed with light armour, only for the preaching or Homilistical flourishes of a Pulpit, but with the . . . armour of veterans and valiant soldiers.

Bp. Gauden, Tears of the Church, p. 621.

homilite (hom'i-lit), n. [Irreg. < Gr. ὁμιλιτε, be together (see homily), + -ite.] A boroscillate of iron and calcium, occurring in black or brownish-black monoclinic crystals near Brevig, Norway. It is closely allied to datolite in form and composition.

homily (hom'i-lī), n.; pl. homilies (-liz). [< OF. homelie, F. homélie = Pr. omelia = Sp. homilia = Pg. homilia = It. omelia, < ML. homilia, a homily, sermon, < Gr. ὁμιλία, intercourse, instruction, a lecture, eccles., a homily, sermon, < ὁμιλος, an assembly, < ὁμός, same, like, ὁμοῦ, together, + ἵλη, ἑλῆ, a company, < ἔλιν, press or crowd together.] 1. In early Christian use, a colloquial and familiar discourse in exposition of Scripture; in modern use, an expository sermon, or one which interprets and applies a particular passage of Scripture rather than elucidates a particular doctrine or theme.

Homilies . . . were a third kind of readings usual in former times, a most commendable institution, as well then to supply the casual, as now the necessary defect of sermons.

Hooker, Eccles. Polity, v. 20.

The homily differs from the kyōs, or discourse, because the homily does not, like the oration or discourse, set forth and illustrate a single theme. It sacrifices artistic unity and simply follows the order of subjects in the passage of Scripture to be explained. On the other hand, a homily is distinct from mere exegesis or exposition, because the latter is addressed to the understanding, while the homily is meant to affect the heart also, and to persuade those who hear to apply the lessons of Scripture for the reformation of their lives.

Cath. Dict.

2. Any expository or hortatory discourse.

Unspoken homilies of peace

Her daily life is preaching.

Whittier, Among the Hills.

Book of homilies. (a) A collection of religious discourses; a homiliary. Specifically—(b) (cap.) In the Ch. of Eng., one of the two series of discourses called "The First" and "The Second Book of Homilies," the former of which appeared in 1547 and the latter in 1563, appointed to be read in the churches when the sermon was omitted. = Syn. Exhortation, etc. See sermon.

homine replegiando (hom'i-nē rē-plē-jī-an'dō). [Abbr. of ML. de homine replegiando, (a writ) of replevying a man: de, of; replegiando, abl. ger. of replegiare, replevy; L. homine, abl. of homo, man; see Homo.] A common-law writ, superseded in England by the writ of habeas corpus, but revived by statute in some of the United States, in the interest of liberty, to replevy a human being out of the custody of any private person, as chattels distrained may be replevied, on giving security. Also called de homine replegiando.

homing (hō'ming), n. [Verbal n. of home, v.] The act of going home.

The much discussed question of the homing of the pigeon, or, as the French call it, orientation, does not seem difficult to meet to one who has had much to do with the birds.

The Century, XXXII, 375.

homing (hō'ming), p. a. [Ppr. of home, v.] Coming home; characterized by an instinctive tendency to return home on being released from restraint: applied to the lower animals, especially to birds, such as carrier-pigeons, that have the faculty of returning from great distances to the place where they were reared, whence their usefulness in conveying written messages.

It is scarcely possible to regard such an instance of what has been called the "homing instinct" as a purely physiological, reflex act, nor to consider the crab mere automaton.

Stand. Nat. Hist., I, Int., p. xxxv.

Cattle have extraordinary homing power; so have horses.

Nature, XXX, 267.

hominid (hom'i-nid), n. One of the Hominidæ; a man.

Hominidæ (hō-min'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < L. homo (homin-), man, + -idæ.] A family of mammals, represented by the single genus Homo, man, of the suborder Anthropoidea and order Primates; mankind. It is characterized by the complete withdrawal of the fore limbs from the office of locomotion, and consequently the habitually erect attitude except in infancy; the perfection of the hand as a prehensile organ, and the specialization of the foot as a locomotory organ; the regular curvature of the line of the teeth, which are of the same length and in uninterrupted series; without diastemata; the nakedness of most of the body; and the large facial angle. These are the principal zoological characters by which the Hominidæ are distinguished from the Simiidae or anthropoid apes. Physiologically, mankind is peculiar chiefly in the capacity of civilization, or ability to create progressive institutions (including the formation and use of speech). Psychologically, man is separated by a very wide interval from the nearest Simiidae. The family is the same as Anthropidae; it is continuous with its single genus, Homo, with the order Simiata, and with the subclass Archæcephala.

hominiform (hō-min'i-fōrm), a. [< L. homo (homin-), man, + forma, shape.] Having the form of the family Hominidæ or genus Homo; anthropoid, in a strict sense; manlike; human.
hominine (hom'i-nin), a. [< L. homo (homin-), man, + -ine.] Pertaining to the genus Homo, or man; manlike; hominiform. [Rare.]

The most distinctively simian, and consequently least hominine, characteristic.

The American, V, 267.

hominisection (hom'i-ni-sek'shən), n. [< L. homo (homin-), man, + sectio(n-), a cutting; see section.] Dissection of man; human anatomy; anthropotomy. [Rare.]

If the author is correct in identifying the muscle . . . with the myon of that name in hominisection.

Cones, The Auk, V, 105.

hominivorous (hom-i-niv'ō-rus), a. [< L. homo (homin-), man, + vorare, eat, devour.] Man-eating; anthropophagous.

There are man-eaters among the hyenas, and these hominivorous animals are greatly dreaded.

J. G. Wood, Illustrated Nat. Hist., p. 224.

hominy (hom'i-nī), n. [Formerly also written homony, hommony, homminy; < Amer. Ind. aukuminea, parched corn (Webster's Dict.,)] Maize hulled and ground or broken more or less coarsely and prepared for food by being mixed with water and boiled.

The English beat [the corn] in a mortar, and sift the flower out of it. The remainder they call hominy.

Quoted in Trans. Amer. Antiq. Soc., IV, 187.

He was so ignorant of grain that our entertainer . . . made him own that a dish of hominy was the best recrudding he had ever tasted.

Smollett, Humphrey Clinker, J. Melford to Sir [W. Phillips, June 10.

Succotash and homony

Were smoking on the board.

O. W. Holmes, Centennial Song.

homish (hō'mish), a. [< home + -ish.] Pertaining to home; resembling or suggesting home; homelike. [Colloq.]

The complexion of Anna's sentiments looked rather homish.

Ticknor, Prescott, p. 108.

The very look of it is homish.

The Advance, Dec. 2, 1886.

homliness, homly. Middle English forms of homeliness, homely.

hommet, v. An obsolete variant of *hum*¹. Chaucer.

hommock, n. Same as hummock.

hommony (hom'g-nī), n. An obsolete form of hominy.

Homo (hō'mō), n. [< L. homo (homin-), acc. hominem, OL. hemo (acc. homonem, homonem, pl. homōnes), man, a human being, a person, body, fellow, = AS. guma (guman-), a man, E. goom², q. v.; usually connected with L. humus, earth, the ground, Gr. χαμαί, on the ground, χῶμα, the earth, the ground; see humus, human, humble³, etc., and chameleon, ethionic, autochthon, etc.] The typical and single genus of Hominidæ; mankind; the human race. It was formally instituted by Linnaeus in his "System of Nature" in 1758, with H. sapiens, man, as its type and leading species; but it also then included the chimpanzee, H. troglodytes. Naturalists now restrict it to H. sapiens, it being generally conceded that mankind constitutes one zoological genus having one species with several geographical races or varieties.

homo-. [NL., etc., homo-, < Gr. ὁμός, one and the same, common, joint, akin to αὐα, together, = E. same, q. v.] An element in some compounds of Greek origin, meaning 'the same': opposed to hetero-.

homobaric (hō-mō-bar'ik), a. [< Gr. ὁμός, the same, + βαρος, weight.] Of uniform weight or gravity.

Homoblastæ (hō-mō-blas'tē-ē), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. ὁμός, the same, + βλαστός, a bud, germ, + -æ.] A division of monocotyledonous plants, proposed by A. de Jussieu, characterized by having the radicle facing the hilum. It embraces orders with the ovary free, as the Juncaceæ (Juncaceæ), Pontederiaceæ, Liliaceæ, Melanthaceæ, etc., and orders with the ovary adherent, as the Dioscoreæ (Dioscoreaceæ), Iridaceæ (Iridaceæ), Amaryllidaceæ (Amaryllidaceæ), Bromeliaceæ, Musaceæ, etc.

homoblastic (hō-mō-blas'tik), a. [< Gr. ὁμός, the same, + βλαστός, a bud, germ.] Having the same germinal origin; derived from like cells: opposed to heteroblastic.

This new cartilage is either homoblastic or heteroblastic.

Dr. H. Gudon, Nature, XXXIX, 150.

Homobranchia (hō-mō-brang'ki-ā), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. ὁμός, the same, + βράγχια, gills.] In Latreille's classification, an order or higher series of crustaceans, containing the decapods: contrasted with Heterobranchia.

homocarpous (hō-mō-kār'pus), a. [< Gr. ὁμός, the same, + καρπός, fruit.] In bot., having all the fruits of one kind.

homocategoric (hō-mō-kat-ē-gor'ik), a. [< Gr. ὁμός, the same, + κατηγορία, category.] Belonging to the same category.

We may next consider whether two organisms compared are of the same category of individuality—are homocategoric.

Encyc. Brit., XVI, 845.

homocentric (hō-mō-sen'trik), a. [< homo- + Gr. κέντρον, center.] Concentric.

homocerc (hō-mō-sérk), a. and n. [< Gr. ὁμός, the same, + κέρκος, the tail.] 1. a. Same as homocercal.

II. n. A homocercal fish.

homocercal (hō-mō-sér'kal), a. [< homocerc + -al.] In ichth., having the caudal fin symmetrical as to its upper and under halves: opposed to heterocercal. See heterocercal, diphycercal, hypural.

The inferior fin-rays are now disposed in such a manner as to give the tail an appearance of symmetry with respect to the axis of the body, and such fishes have been called homocercal.

Huxley, Anat. Vert., p. 21.

homocercy (hō-mō-sér-sī), n. [< homocerc + -y.] The state or character of being homocercal; equality or symmetry in the tail or caudal fin of a fish.

Homochelæ (hō-mō-kē'lē), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. ὁμός, the same, + χῆλη, claw.] In Latreille's system of classification, a section of crabs having the claws of equal size in both sexes: contrasted with Heterochelæ. It contained 6 tribes, Quadrilatera, Arcuata, Pinnipedes, Cristimani, Cryptopoda, and Notopoda.

Homochroma (hō-mō-kro'mā), n. [NL., < Gr. ὁμός, the same, + χρῶμα, color.] A monotypic genus of plants, of the natural order Compositæ, tribe Asteroidæ, the type of the subtribe Homochromæ, founded by De Candolle in 1836. The head is radiate, the involucre broad, the achenia flatly compressed, and the pappus plumose, in a single rigid series. They are half-shrubby, erect, branching herbs, with all the parts very rough with glandular bristles; the leaves alternate, narrow, entire; the flower-heads long-peduncled; and the rays always yellow. The single species, H. Eklonia, is a native of South Africa.

Homochromæ (hō-mō-kro'mē-ē), n. pl. [NL., < Homochroma + -æ.] A subtribe of asteroid Compositæ, founded by Bentham and Hooker in 1876, and typified by the genus Homochroma. It is characterized by having the disk wholly of hermaphrodite flowers, of the same color as the ray when that is present, mostly yellow; the corollas tubular, with more or less amplified throat and 4- or 5-lobed limb; the receptacle not chaffy; and the involucre closely imbricated in several rows.

homochromous (hō-mō-kro'mūs), a. [< Gr. ὁμός, the same, + χρῶμα, color.] 1. In bot., having, as a flower-head, all the florets of the same color.—2. In zool., being all of one color; whole-colored.

homocinchonin (hō'mō-sin-kon'i-sin), n. [< homo + cinchona + -in + -in.] An artificial alkaloid (C₁₉H₂₂N₂O) prepared from cinchona.

homocinchonidin (hō'mō-sin-kon'i-din), n. [< homo + cinchona + -id + -in.] A natural alkaloid (C₁₉H₂₂N₂O) found in cinchona.

homocinchonine (hō'mō-sin-kō-nin), n. [< homo + cinchona + -ine.] A natural alkaloid (C₁₉H₂₂N₂O) found in cinchona which is levogyrate.

Homoderma (hō-mō-dēr'mā), n. [< Gr. ὁμός, the same, + δέρμα, the skin.] The typical genus of Homodermitæ. A species is named H. sycandra.

homodermic (hō-mō-dēr'mik), a. [< Gr. ὁμός, the same, + δέρμα, the skin, + -ic.] In biol., homological with reference to derivation from one of the three primary blastoderms (endoderm, mesoderm, and ectoderm), as any organ or tissue of the body.

This correspondence, which is of high importance in determining homologies, may be termed homodermic. Encyc. Brit., XX, 421.

Homodermidæ (hō-mō-dēr'mi-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Homoderma + -idæ.] A family of chalk-sponges, or Calcispongiæ, in which the gastral cavity forms cecal outgrowths resembling the tubes of Syconidæ. The genera are Homoderma and Ascaltis.

homodont (hō'mō-dont), a. [< Gr. ὁμός, the same, + ὀδών (odont-) = E. tooth.] Having teeth all alike, as a dolphin: opposed to heterodont.

The simplest dentition as a whole is that of many species of Dolphin. . . . Such a dentition is called homodont. W. H. Flower, Encyc. Brit., XV, 352.

homodromal (hō-mō-drō-māl), a. [As homodromous + -al.] Same as homodromous.

homodromous (hō-mō-drō-mūs), a. [< Gr. ὁμός, the same, + δρομος, running the same course, < ὁμός, the same, + δρομος, a course, race, < δραμναι, run.] 1. In mech., having, as a lever, the power and weight on the same side of the fulcrum, so that both move up or down together. See lever.—2. In bot., having a similar spiral arrangement of the leaves on the stem and branches; having the spires running in the same direction: opposed to heterodromous.

homodromy (hō-mō-drō-mi), n. [As homodromous + -y.] The state of being homodromous.

homodynamous (hō-mō-dī'na-mūs), a. [< Gr. ὁμός, the same, + δύναμις, power.] Of or pertaining to homodynamy; serially homologous.

The Metameres therefore are homodynamous parts; as are the segments of the Arthropoda, etc. Gegenbaur, Comp. Anat. (trans.), p. 64.

Two plexuses may be homodynamous, although, strictly speaking, not homologous. Nature, XXXIX, 151.

homodynamy (hō-mō-dī'na-mi), n. [As homodynamous + -y.] In biol., the relation subsisting between the segments (metameres or somites) of the body which are arranged along its long axis; serial homology, in the usual sense of that term.

Homodynamy is distinguished . . . by the fact that the parts in question are arranged along the long axis of the body and define its type. Gegenbaur, Comp. Anat. (trans.), p. 64.

As regards homodynamy, another characteristic which appears to be universal among the Multituberculates is the fore-and-aft grinding motion between the alternating rows of tubercles upon the upper and lower molars. Amer. Naturalist, XXII, 238.

homeo-. [NL. L. homeo-, E. homeo-, or as L., NL., E., etc., sometimes less prop. homoio-, F. homéo-, etc., < Gr. ὁμοιος, or ὁμοιος, like, similar (L. similis), also the same, < ὁμός, the same: see Homo.] An element in English words from the Greek, meaning 'like, similar.' In words thoroughly Englished, as homeopathy, etc., the spelling homeo- is to be preferred.

homeodont (hō'mē-ō-dont), a. [< Gr. ὁμοιος, like, + ὀδών (odont-) = E. tooth.] In odontog., simply conical, without crests or tubercles, as a molar tooth.

He divides the molar teeth of Mammalia into three categories, the simply conical, "Homeodont"; the vertically plicate, "Elasmodont"; and the cross-crested by junction of four tubercles, the "Zygodont." Amer. Naturalist, XXII, 834.

homeoid, n. See homeoid.

homeomer (hō-mē-om'ē-rāl), a. [< Gr. ὁμομερής, consisting of like parts: see homeomerous.] In anc. pros.: (a) Containing two similar systems or strophes. (b) Consisting of pericopes each of which contains two systems metrically similar: as, a homeomer poem.

Homeomeri (hō'mē-ō-mē'ri), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. ὁμοιος, like, + μῦρος, thigh.] In ornith., in Garrod's and Forbes's arrangements, a division of mesomyodian passerines, embracing those forms which have the sciatic artery well developed, as is usual in birds: opposed to Heteromeri. The Homeomeri are divided into the Tracheophonæ and the Haploophonæ. Also spelled Homeomeri.

homeomeria (hō'mē-ō-mē-ri'ā), n. [NL. homeomeria (-ē).] [L.] Same as homeomeria.

Anaxagoras of Clazomenæ (in Asia Minor), born about 500 B. C., reduced all origin and decay to a process of mingling and unmingling, but assumed as ultimate elements an unlimited number of primitive, qualitatively determinate substances, which were called by him seeds of things, by Aristotle elements consisting of homogeneous parts, and by later writers (employing a term framed from the Aristotelian phraseology) Homeomeria. Überweg, Hist. Phil. (tr. by Morris), § 24.

homeomerical (hō'mē-ō-mē-rik), a. [< homeomeria + -ic.] Pertaining to or characterized by sameness of parts or homogeneity of structure; advocating or receiving the doctrine of homeomeria. Also homeomerice.

homeomerical² (hō'mē-ō-mē-rik), a. [As Homeomeri + -ic.] In ornith., of or pertaining to the Homeomeri; having the sciatic artery normally developed. Also homeomerice.

homeomerous (hō-mē-om'ē-rūs), a. [< Gr. ὁμομερής, consisting of like parts, < ὁμοιος, like, + μέρος, part.] Having like parts; specifically, in lichenol., having the gonidia and hyphæ distributed uniformly throughout the thallus, without evidence of stratification. Compare heteromerous. Also homeomerous, and improperly homeomerous.

homeomery (hō-mē-om'ē-ri), n. [L. homeomeria, < Gr. ὁμομερεια, the homogeneity of the elements or first principles, < ὁμομερής, consisting of like parts: see homeomerous.] The doctrine, attributed by Aristotle and others to Anaxagoras, that the elements or primitive substances are bodies whose parts are similar to the whole; also, one of these elementary substances. Also homeomeria, homeomeria.

homeomorph (hō'mē-ō-mōrf), n. [NL. homeomorphus: see homeomorphous.] A substance exhibiting homeomorphism. Also homeomorph.

homeomorphism (hō'mē-ō-mōrf'izm), n. [< homeomorphous + -ism.] 1. Similarity in crystalline form, but not necessarily in chemical composition.—2. Same as isomorphism.

Also homeomorphism. homeomorphous (hō'mē-ō-mōrf'us), a. [NL. homeomorphus, < Gr. ὁμομορφος, of like form, < ὁμοιος, like, + μόρφη, form.] Having a like crystalline form, but not necessarily analogous composition. Thus, topaz and danburite are closely similar in form, but apparently not related in chemical composition. Also used as synonymous with isomorphous. Also homeomorphous.

Homeomyari (hō'mē-ō-mi-ā'ri-i), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. ὁμοιος, like, + μῦρος, muscle, + L. -arius.] In ornith., a division of birds proposed by Alix, founded upon the character of the flexor muscles of the back of the thigh. [Scarcely used.]

homeopath, homeopathic, etc. See homeopathy, etc.

homeoplastic, a. See homeoplastic.

homeoprophoron (hō'mē-ō-prof'ō-ron), n. [NL. homeoprophora (-rā).] [< LL. homeoprophoron, < Gr. ὁμοιοπρόφορος, alliteration, neut. of ὁμοιοπρόφορος, < ὁμοιος, like, + προφορά, utterance, < προφέρω, bring to, utter.] In anc. rhet., alliteration, especially as a fault in composition. Also called parhomocion.

homeoptoton (hō'mē-ōp-tō'ton), n. [< LL. homeoptoton, < Gr. ὁμοοππρωτος, with a similar inflection, < ὁμοιος, like, + πρωτος, ease, inflection, < πρωτος, apt to fall, fallen, < πίπτειν, fall.] In anc. rhet., the use of a series of nouns in the same case, of verbs with the same inflection, etc., especially at the close of successive clauses.

Homocosauria (hō'mē-ō-sā'ri-ā), n. pl. [NL., < Homocosaurius.] An extinct suborder of rhynchocephalian reptiles, comprising forms without a beak formed by the premaxilla, and without uncinatæ processes to the ribs. The Homocosauriæ form the principal family. Also Homocosauria.

homeosaurian (hō'mē-ō-sā'ri-an), a. Of or pertaining to the Homocosauria.

Homocosaurus (hō'mē-ō-sā'rus), n. [NL., < Gr. ὁμοιος, like, + σαῦρος, lizard.] The typical genus of Homocosauria, from the lithographic slates of Solenhofen, Bavaria. F. Meyer, 1847.

homeosemant (hō'mē-ō-sē'mant), n. [< Gr. ὁμοσημῶς, of like signification, < ὁμοιος, like, + σημα, a mark, sign, < σημαίνω, mark, signify, σημαντός, verbal adj.] One of several words having nearly the same meaning. [Rare.]

What we have long and loosely called synonyms are now understood to be, with trifling exceptions, pseudo-synonyms, by which are meant vocabularies approximating in import, but not equipollent or interchangeable. . . . The exact technicality is homeosemant. F. Hall, Mod. Eng., p. 172.

homeoteleuton (hō'mē-ō-te-lū'ton), n. [NL. homeoteleuta (-tā).] [L.] Homeoteleuton, < Gr. ὁμοτελευτων, like ending, rime, neut. of ὁμοτελευτός, having a like ending, < ὁμοιος, like, + τελευτῶ, ending, < τελεῖν, end.] In rhet., a figure consisting in the use of a succession of words or clauses concluding with the same sounds. Homeoteleuton is a more comprehensive term than rime, including time, some forms of assonance, and all other cases of similarity of termination in successive words, clauses, or lines.

homeozoic (hō'mē-ō-zō'ik), a. [< Gr. ὁμοιος, the same, similar, + ζῷον, life, + -ic.] Containing similar forms of life, as zones or belts of the ocean or of the surface of the earth. These zones are not parallel with lines of latitude, but undulate in subordination to climatic influences.

homofocal (hō-mō-fō'kal), a. [< Gr. ὁμός, the same, + E. focal.] Confocal.

homogamous (hō-mog'a-mūs), a. [< Gr. ὁμός, the same, + γάμος, marriage.] In bot., having all the florets hermaphrodite, as certain grasses and composite plants; bearing one kind of flowers.

homogamy (hō-mog'a-mi), n. [< homogamous + -y.] The state of being homogamous; fertilization in a plant when the stamens and pistil of a hermaphrodite flower mature simultaneously.

Homogangliata (hō-mō-gang-gli-ā'tā), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of homogangliatus*: see homogangliate.] A name proposed by Owen for the Articulata of Cuvier, in accordance with a scheme of classification based on the nervous system in animals.

homogangliate (hō-mō-gang-gli-āt), a. and n. [NL. homogangliatus*, < Gr. ὁμός, the same, + γάγγλιον, a ganglion.] 1. a. In zool., having a nervous system in which the ganglia are symmetrically arranged on right and left sides, as the Annulosa.

II. n. A member of the Homogangliata. homogen (hō'mō-jen), n. [< Gr. ὁμογενής, of the same race, family, or kind: see homogeneous.] 1. pl. In bot., in Lindley's classification, a group of exogenous plants characterized by the arrangement of the wood in the form of a series of wedges instead of in concentric circles, as in the stems of Piperaceæ, Aristolochiæ, Mni-spermaceæ, etc.—2. The offspring of the same or of specifically identical parents.

We can consider the different men as forming a relative homogen—a species, as M. de Quatrefages contends. Pop. Sci. Mo., XXXIV, 179.

homogenet (hō'mō-jen), a. [F. homogène: see homogeneous.] Same as homogeneous.

Now what the sapor pontic? sapor styctic? Or, what is homogene, or heterogene? E. Jenson, Alchemist, li. 5.

Homogenea (hō'mō-jē-nē-ā), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of homogeneous: see homogeneous.] 1. In Cuvier's system of classification, the second order of Infusoria or Animalcula: approximately equivalent to Protozoa, though including some Infusoria proper, as Urceolaria, with Cercaria (Spermatozoa), Vibrio, Proteus, Monas, Volvox, etc. It is thus a heterogeneous group, like the Polygastrea of Ehrenberg.—2. [h. c.] Plural of homogeneous.

homogeneous (hō-mō-jē-nē-ā), a. [As homogeneous + -al.] Homogeneous.

Things simply pure are inconsistent in the mass of nature, nor are the elements or humors in Mans Body exactly homogeneous. Milton, Reformation in Eng., II.

A homogeneous existence. Longfellow, Hyperion, II. vi.

Homogenei (hō-mō-jē-nē-i), n. pl. [NL., masc. pl. of homogeneous: see homogeneous.] An order of lichens proposed by Acharius (1810), including the genera Lecidea, Opegrapha, Calicium, etc., now referred to various orders.

homogeneity (hō-mō-jē-nē-i-ti), n. [= F. homogénéité = Sp. homogeneidad = Pg. homogeneidade = It. omogeneità; as homogeneous + -ity.] The state or character of being homogeneous; likeness or correspondence of parts or qualities; composition from like parts; agreement in elements or characteristics; congruity of constitution.

They appear, as they become more minute, to be reduced to a homogeneity and simplicity of composition which almost excludes them from the domain of animal life. Whewell.

Law of homogeneity, in alg., the principle that only magnitudes of the same kind can be added together. This is laid down by Vietà, but is not admitted by modern mathematicians.—Principle of homogeneity, in logic and metaph., the proposition that no two conceivable things can be without any similarity.

The three principles of Homogeneity, of Specification, and of Continuity or Affinity, as is now sufficiently evident, have a peculiar position in our intellectual constitution. E. Caird, Philos. of Kant, p. 688.

homogeneous (hō-mō-jē-nē-us), a. [F. homogène; = Sp. homogéneo = Pg. homogeneo = It. omogeneo, < NL. homogeneous, < Gr. ὁμογενής, of the same race, family, or kind, < ὁμός, the same, + γένος, race, family, kind: see genus.] 1. Of the same kind; essentially like; of the same nature: said especially of parts of one whole: opposed to heterogeneous.

Every concept contains other concepts under it; and therefore, when divided proximately, we descend always to other concepts, but never to individuals; in other words, things the most homogeneous—similar—must in certain respects be heterogeneous—dissimilar.

Sir W. Hamilton, Logic (1874), I. 210.

2. Having parts of only one kind; composed of similar parts or congruous elements. See heterogeneous.

If a series of rays of homogeneous light, travelling in homogeneous isotropic media, be at any place normal to a wave-front, they will possess the same property after any number of reflections and refractions.

Tait, Light, § 216.

Homogeneous coordinates. See coordinate.—Homogeneous equation, function, light, number, product, strain, etc. See the nouns.—Homogeneous steel. Same as cast-steel. = Syn. Cognate, kindred, allied, akin, uniform; congeneric.

homogeneously (hō-mō-jē-nē-us-li), adv. In a homogeneous manner; in the same or an accordant way; so as to be homogeneous.

homogeneousness (hō-mō-jē-nē-us-ness), n. Same as homogeneity.

homogenesis (hō-mō-jē-nē-sis), n. [NL., < Gr. ὁμός, the same, + γένεσις, birth: see genesis.] In biol., the ordinary course of generation, in which the offspring is like the parent and runs through the same cycle of development. It contrasts with certain special modes of generation, as heterogenesis, xenogenesis, parthenogenesis, etc.

homogenetic (hō-mō-jē-net'ik), a. [< homogenesis: see genetic.] 1. Of, pertaining to, or characterized by homogenesis; passing through the same cycle of existence as the parent.—2. Having a common origin; derived from the same structure, however variously modified, as organs or parts of any two or more animals: synonymous with homologous in its biological sense, and distinguished from homoplastic.

On the use of the term homology in modern zoology and the distinction between homogenetic and homoplastic agreements.

E. R. Lankester, Ann. and Mag. Nat. Hist., 1870.

homogeneous (hō-mō-jē-nē-um), n.; pl. homogenea (-ā). [NL., neut. of homogeneous: see homogeneous.] Something homogeneous.—Homogeneous affection, in alg., a term of an algebraic equation containing the unknown, but not to the highest power.—Homogeneous comparison, the negative of the absolute term of an algebraic equation.

homogenize (hō-moj'e-niz), v. t.; pret. and pp. homogenized, ppr. homogenizing. [< homogene

+ -ize.] To make homogeneous; mix evenly, as several ingredients; reduce to an even standard.

The whole island would have become homogenized by the action of strong centrifugal forces.

Fortnightly Rev., N. S., XL. 201.

homogenous (hō-moj'e-nus), a. [Var. of homogeneous.] Having the same origin; derived from the same source; homogenetic: distinguished from homoplastic.

homogeny (hō-moj'e-ni), n. [< Gr. ὁμογένεια, community of origin, < ὁμογενής, of the same race or family: see homogeneous.] 1. Sameness of nature or kind.

The fifth [means to induce and accelerate putrefaction] is, either by the exhaling, or by the driving back of the principal spirits, which preserve the consistence of the body; so that when their government is dissolved, every part returneth to his nature, or homogeny.

Bacon, Nat. Hist., § 333.

2. In biol., descent from a common ancestor; blood-relationship among animals. The term is used by Lankester in distinction from homoplasia, and as synonymous with homology in an ordinary sense.

homogonous (hō-moj'ō-nus), a. [< Gr. ὁμός, similar, + γόνος, offspring.] In bot., having stamens and pistils of the same height in individuals of the same species, as some hermaphrodite flowers: same as homostyled, and opposed to dimorphous. Compare heterogonous. Asa Gray, 1877.

homogony (hō-moj'ō-ni), n. [< homogonous + -y.] The condition or state of being homogonous.

homograph (hō-mō-grāf), n. [< Gr. ὁμογράφος, of the same letters (cf. ὁμογραφία, write in the same manner), < ὁμός, the same, + γραφή, a writing, < γράφειν, write.] In philol., a word which has exactly the same form as another, though of a different origin and signification: thus, base the adjective and base the noun, fair the adjective and fair the noun, are homographs. See homonym.

homographic (hō-mō-graf'ik), a. [< Gr. ὁμός, the same, + γραφία, a writing (see homograph), + -ic.] 1. In geom., having the same anharmonic ratio or system of anharmonic ratios; capable of being brought into coincidence by a series of central projections upon planes; so related, as two figures, that to any point in one (without exception) only one point in the other corresponds, and vice versa, while to points situated in a line in either figure correspond collinear points in the other.—2. In orthography, relating to homography; employing the same character at all times and in all circumstances to represent the same sound: as, a homographic alphabet.—Homographic transformation, a transformation between homographic figures.

homography (hō-mō-gra-fi), n. [As homograph-ic + -y.] 1. In orthography, the representation of each sound by a distinctive character, which is employed for that sound alone.—2. In geom., the relation between homographic figures.

homohedral (hō-mō-hē-dral), a. [< Gr. ὁμοῦδος, having a like seat (base), < ὁμός, the same, + ἔδρα, a seat, base.] Having equal or like sides; holohedral.

Homohedral or holohedral forms are those which, like the cube and octohedron, possess the highest degree of symmetry of which the system admits.

W. A. Miller, Elem. of Chem., § 82.

homoiomerous (hō-moi-om'e-rus), a. See homœomerous.

homoiouian (hō-moi-ō'si-an), a. and n. [Prop., according to the L. transliteration, homœusian*, but the accepted form rests directly upon the Gr.; < LG. ὁμοιοῦσιος, of like nature or substance, < ὁμοιος, like, similar, + οἰσία, being, < ὄν, fem. οἷσα, being, ppr. of εἶναι = L. esse, be: see be, entity, ontology. Cf. homœusian.] I. a. 1. Having a similar nature.—2. [cap.] Relating to the Homoiouians or their belief.

II. n. [cap.] One of the Semi-Arians, followers of Eusebius, who maintained that the nature of Christ is similar to, but not the same with, that of the Father: opposed to Homœusian.

homiozoic (hō-moi-ō-zō'ik), a. Same as homœozoic.

homolateral (hō-mō-lat'er-al), a. [< Gr. ὁμός, the same, + L. latus (later-, side).] 1. Same as homohedral.—2. Being on the same side.

homologa, n. Plural of homologon.

homologal (hō-mol'ō-gal), a. [As homologous + -al.] Agreeable, or like one another. Bailey, 1731.

homologate (hō-mol'ō-gāt), v. t.; pret. and pp. homologated, ppr. homologating. [< ML. homologatus, pp. of homologare (> It. omologare = Sp. Pg. homologar = F. homologuer), < Gr. ὁμολογεῖν, agree, admit, assent, < ὁμολογος, agreeing: see homologous.] To approve; allow; establish; ratify.

We may take the Doctor's facts without homologating his conclusions. Dr. J. Brown, Spare Hours, § 227.

I do not, therefore, homologate everything which they have written both on the great Pyramid subject and anything else. Piazzi Smyth, Pyramid, p. 173.

homologation (hō-mol'ō-gā'shon), n. [= F. homologation = Sp. homologación = Pg. homologação = It. omologazione, < ML. as if homologatio* (-n), < homologare, homologate: see homologate.] The act of homologating; approval; ratification; confirmation. Specifically, in Scots law, a technical expression signifying an act by which a person approves a deed, the effect of which approbatory act is to render that deed, though itself defective, binding upon the person by whom it is homologated.

homological (hō-mol'ō-j'i-kal), a. [< homology + -ic + -al.] 1. Pertaining to or characterized by homology; having a structural affinity: distinguished from analogical, and opposed to adaptive. See homology.

I have . . . treated the metamorphoses at greater length than I should otherwise have done, on account of the great importance of arriving at a correct homological interpretation of the different parts of the mature animal. Darwin, Ciriopidea, p. 25.

2. In geom., being in homology or plane perspective, as two figures in one plane.

homologically (hō-mol'ō-j'i-kal-i), adv. In a homological manner or sense; by means of homologies: distinguished from analogically.

homologize (hō-mol'ō-jīz), v.; pret. and pp. homologized, ppr. homologizing. [< homologous + -ize.] I. trans. To make homologous; make out or demonstrate the correspondence of. See homologous.

In the great class of mollusks, though we can homologize the parts of one species with those of another, we can indicate but few serial homologies.

Darwin, Origin of Species, p. 381.

The parts of the segments of the cranium may be now more or less completely parallelized or homologized with each other. E. D. Cope, Origin of the Fittest, p. 181.

II. intrans. To be homologous; specifically, in biol., to correspond in structural position, either in different bodies or in parts of the same body: as, the maxilla of insects homologize with the legs, the wings of a bird with the arms of a man, etc.

Two ventricles occur in the cerebrum of Scyllium, Rhina, and Acanthias which homologize with the lateral ventricles in the cerebrum of Mammalia.

Nature, XXXIII. 333.

homologon (hō-mol'ō-gon), n.; pl. homologons, homologa (-gonz, -gā). [< Gr. ὁμολογον, neut. of ὁμολογος, agreeing: see homologous.] Something that corresponds to or agrees with another; a thing or an event that is essentially a repetition of another.

One of the curious homologons of history is this repetition in Europe of the course of events in Asia.

J. F. Clarke, Ten Great Religions, I. 4.

homologous (hō-mol'ō-gus), a. [= F. homologue = Sp. homólogo = Pg. homologo = It. omologo, < NL. homologous, < Gr. ὁμολογος, agreeing, correspondent, < ὁμός, the same, + λέγειν, speak, > λόγος, proportion, etc.] Having the same relative position, proportion, value, or structure; having correspondence or likeness. Specifically.—(a) In geom., corresponding in relative position and proportion; also, homological or in homology. (b) In alg., having the same relative proportion or value, as the two antecedents or the two consequents of a proportion. (c) In chem., being of the same chemical type or series; differing by a multiple or an arithmetical ratio in certain constituents, while the physical qualities are analogous, with small differences, as if corresponding to a series of parallels: as, the species in the several groups of alcohols, fatty acids, and aromatic acids are homologous with the others in the same group. (d) In zool. and bot., corresponding in type of structure; having like relations to a fundamental type. Thus, the human arm, the fore leg of a horse, the wing of a bird, and the swimming-paddle of a dolphin or whale, being all composed essentially of the same structural elements, are said to be homologous, though they are adapted for quite different functions.

All physiologists admit that the swim-bladder is homologous, or "ideally similar" in position and structure, with the lungs of the higher vertebrate animals.

Darwin, Origin of Species, p. 183.

The tissues themselves, in some cases of dissimilar structure, may be homologous, but they are homologous tissues, and not homologous parts of a system of tissues.

Bessey, Botany, p. 120.

homolographic (hō-mol'ō-graf'ik), a. [< Gr. ὁμός, the same, + λόγος, whole, + γράφειν, write.] Maintaining or exhibiting the true proportions of parts; preserving true relative areas.—Homolographic projection, a method of laying down portions of the earth's surface on a map or chart so that equal areas on the sphere are represented by equal areas on the map.

homologue (hō-mō-log), n. [< F. homologue, < Gr. ὁμολογος: see homologous.] That which is homologous; something having the same relative position, proportion, value, or structure. Thus, the corresponding sides, etc., of similar geometrical figures are homologues; the members of a homologous series in chemistry are homologues; an organ agreeing in the plan of its structure with a corresponding organ in a different animal, though differing in function, is a homologue of this corresponding organ. See analogue, 4.

homologumena (hō-mō-lō-gū-me-nā), n. pl. [Gr. ὁμολογούμενα (sc. βιβλία), neut. pl. of ὁμολογέω, ppr. pass. of ὁμολογέω, agree, admit, acknowledge: see homologate, homologous.] The books of the New Testament the authenticity and authority of which were generally acknowledged in the primitive church. The term is adopted from the church historian Eusebius (about A. D. 270–340), who classifies the books claiming authority as Christian Scriptures under three heads, according as they were received throughout the church, were disputed by some, or had never been recognized, calling these three classes homologumena, antilegomena, and apocrypha, respectively. He enumerates as homologumena the four Gospels, the Acts, the Epistles of Paul, the First Epistle of John, and the First Epistle of Peter; classes the Epistle of James, that of Jude, the Second of Peter, the Second and Third of John as antilegomena; and says that some reject the Apocalypse and the Gospel according to the Hebrews, while others regard them as homologumena. He mentions as spurious the Acts of Paul, the Pastor (of Hermas), the Apocalypse of Peter, the Epistle of Barnabas, and the book called the Teachings of the Apostles, as well as other writings purporting to be apostolic. Also written homologoumena.

homology (hō-mol'ō-gi), n.; pl. homologies (-jiz). [Gr. ὁμολογία, agreement, conformity, < ὁμολογέω, agreeing: see homologous.] The state or character of being homologous; correspondence. Specifically—(1) In bot., that relation between parts which results from their development from corresponding embryonic parts, either in different animals, as in the case of the arm of man, the fore leg of a quadruped, and the wing of a bird, or in the same animal, as in the case of the fore and hind legs in quadrupeds, or of the segments or rings and their appendages of which the body of a worm, a centipede, etc., is composed. Homology in this sense implies genetic relationship, and consequently morphological likeness or structural affinity; and it is distinguished from analogy, which usually results from physiological adaptation of unlike parts to like functions, and therefore implies a merely adaptive modification, which brings about a superficial resemblance between things quite unlike in structure, as between the wing of a bird and that of a butterfly. Several kinds of homology are distinguished: (1) general, which is the relation of an organism, or of any of its parts, to the general type or plan of such organisms or parts; (2) serial, which is the correspondence of metamorphically multiplied parts in any organism, as of successive ribs, legs, vertebrae, etc., with one another; (3) special, which is the correspondence of a part or organ of one animal with the same part in another, as the homology between a horse's fore "knee" and the human wrist, etc. See homologous, homologue.

In the great class of mollusks, though it can easily be shown that the parts in distinct species are homologous, but few serial homologies can be indicated: that is, we are seldom enabled to say that one part is homologous with another part in the same individual.

Darwin, Origin of Species, p. 393.

(b) In geom., the relation between two corresponding figures lying in the same plane which are such that corresponding points are collinear with a fixed point called the center of homology, while corresponding lines intersect on a fixed line called the axis of homology.—Axis of homology. See axis.—Center of homology. See center.—Coefficient of homology. See coefficient.

homolalous (hō-mom'ā-lus), a. [Gr. ὁμός, the same, + ὅαλος, even, level, equal, < ὁμός, the same.] In bot., having the leaves or branches all bent or curved to one side: applied particularly to mosses.

homomeral (hō-mom'ē-rāl), a. [Gr. ὁμός, the same, + μέρος, part, + -άλ.] Alike in all their parts: applied to two or more things.

Homomorpha (hō-mō-mōr'fā), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. ὁμός, the same, + μορφή, form.] The series of insects in which metamorphosis is incomplete, the larvæ resembling the imago to some extent, though wingless. The Hemiptera, Orthoptera, and Pseudoneuroptera are of this series, which is also called Hemimetabola: opposed to Heteromorpha.

homomorphic (hō-mō-mōr'fik), a. [As homomorphous + -ic.] 1. Same as homomorphous.—2. In entom., pertaining to or having the characters of the Homomorpha; hemimetabolous.

homomorphism (hō-mō-mōr'fiz'm), n. [As homomorphous + -ism.] Mimicry or imitation of one thing by another; adaptive or analogical resemblance, without true homological or morphological similarity; superficial likeness without structural affinity or relationship. Also homomorphy.

homomorphous (hō-mō-mōr'fus), a. [Gr. ὁμός, the same, + μορφή, form.] Analogous, not homologous, in form or aspect; superficially alike; exhibiting homomorphism. Also homomorphic.

Many examples occur, both among animals and among plants, in which families widely removed from one another as to their fundamental structure nevertheless present a singular, and sometimes extremely close, resemblance in their external characters. . . . Homomorphous forms are . . . found in different parts of the earth's surface. Thus, the place of the Cacti of South America is taken by the Euphorbia of Africa; or, to take a zoological illustration, many of the different orders of Mammalia are represented in the single order Marsupialia in Australia.

H. A. Nicholson, Manual of Zool., Int., § 7. homomorphy (hō-mō-mōr'fi), n. [As homomorphous + -y.] Same as homomorphism.

In his Kalkschwämme Haeckel proposed to term homophyly the phylogenetic homology in opposition to homomorphy, to which genealogic bias is wanting.

Encyc. Brit., XVI. 845.
homonomous (hō-mon'ō-mus), a. [Gr. ὁμόνομος, under the same laws, < ὁμός, the same, + νόμος, law.] Of or pertaining to homonymy; having the quality of homonymy, or that kind of special homology.

The rays of the pectoral and pelvic fins of fishes, the individual fingers and toes of the higher Vertebrata, are homonomous parts. Gegenbaur, Comp. Anat. (trans.), p. 64.

homonymy (hō-mon'ō-mi), n. [As homonomous + -y.] 1. The morphological relation or special homology existing between parts which are arranged along a transverse axis of the body, or in one segment only of its long axis. See homonomous.—2. Lack of distinction of parts, as the absence of segmentation, or the equivalence of the divisions of the body, among annelids: contrasted with heteronymy. Encyc. Brit., II. 648. [Rare.]

homony (hom'ō-ni), n. An obsolete form of hominy.

homonym (hō-mō-nim), n. [Formerly also homonymy = F. homonyme = Sp. homónimo = Pg. homônimo = It. omonimo, < L. homonymus, < Gr. ὁμόνομος, having the same name, < ὁμός, the same, + ὄνυμα, ὄνομα, name: see onym, name.] 1. One word used to express distinct meanings, or applied as a name to different things: as, Heteropus is a homonym of eight different genera.—2. In philol., a word which agrees with another in sound, and perhaps in spelling, but is not the same in meaning; a homophone: as, meet, meat, and mete, or the verb bear and the noun bear. The term is also loosely extended to include words spelled alike but pronounced differently, as bow, bend, bow, a weapon; lead, conduct, lead, a metal, etc. The words so designated may be akin or even ultimately identical in origin, as air, air, bow, bow, meet, meet. See homophone, 2, homograph, 1.

Animal is a common name to man and beast, and yet not a homonym; for although one is the definition of man, another of beast, as they differ in names, yet convene they in one definition which answers to the common name of animal, and that is enough to hinder it here from being a homonym; but if animal be referred to a living animal and a painted, tis a homonym, because no definition is in common to a living animal and a painted that is accommodated to the common name of animal.

Burgersdicius, tr. by a Gentleman.
Arbitrary homonym, a name arbitrarily borrowed from one thing to be applied to another, as brougham for a kind of coach.—Casual homonym, a word accidentally having the same sound as another.—Tropical homonym, a word used by a figure of speech in an essentially changed meaning. Thus, the horn of a dilemma is a tropical homonym of the horn of an ox.

homonymic (hō-mō-nim'ik), a. [Homonymy + -ic.] Having the same name or sound; of or pertaining to homonymy or homonyms.

The homonymic designation of a thing by something which called to mind the sounds of which its name was composed. Whitney, Lang. and Study of Lang., p. 454.

homonymical (hō-mō-nim'ik-āl), a. [Homonymy + -al.] Same as homonymic.

homonymous (hō-mon'ī-mus), a. [L. homonymus, having the same name: see homonymy.] 1. Of the same name; expressed or characterized by the same term. In optics, the double images of an object produced by the eyes under certain conditions are said to be homonymous if respectively on the same side as the eye in which they are produced—that is, when the right-hand image is that produced in the right eye, etc.; if the images are on opposite sides, they are called heteronymous.

The diplopia which exists when both eyes look down is homonymous (that is, the image formed by the affected eye is on the same side as that eye).

Quain, Med. Dict., p. 518.

2. Having the same sound, but different significations or origins, or applied to different things; equivocal; ambiguous; specifically, in philol., of the character of homonyms. See homonymy, 2.

It is a rule in art that words which are homonymous, of various and ambiguous significations, ought ever in the first place to be distinguished.

Abp. Bramhall, Against Hobbes, p. 19.
We can hardly doubt that it was Aristotle who first gave this peculiar distinctive meaning to the two words homonymous and synonymous, rendered in modern phraseology (through the Latin) equivocal and univocal.

Grote, Aristotle, p. 57.
Homonymous diplopia, diplopia in which the right-hand image is formed by the right eye: here the visual axes cross one another between the observer and the object. Also called simple diplopia, and contrasted with crossed diplopia.—Homonymous genus, hemianopsia, etc. See the nouns.

homonymously (hō-mon'ī-mus-ly), adv. In a homonymous manner.

As the eyes begin to converge, the images of both objects double homonymously. Le Conte, Sight, p. 109.

homonymy (hō-mon'ī-mi), n. [= F. homonymie = Sp. homonimia = Pg. homonymia = It. omonimia, < Gr. ὁμωνυμία, a having the same name, identity, ambiguity, < ὁμόνομος: see homonymy, homonymous.] Sameness of name with a difference of meaning; ambiguity; equivocation; specifically, in philol., the character of homonyms.

There being in this age two Patricks, . . . and that the homonymy be as well in place as in name, three Bangors. Fuller.

Fallacy of homonymy. See fallacy.

homo-organ (hō-mō-ōr'gan), n. Same as homorgan.

Homoplasts or homo-organs. Encyc. Brit., XVI. 842.

homoëusian (hō-mō-ō'si-an), a. and n. [Prop., according to the L. transliteration, homōeusian, but the accepted form rests directly on the Gr.; < LGr. ὁμοευσίος, consubstantial, neut. ὁμοευσίον, sameness of essence or of substance (prop. ὁμοευσίος, a form found, but marked dubious), < Gr. ὁμός, the same, + οὐσία, being, essence: cf. homoëusian.] 1. a. 1. Having the same nature.—2. [cap.] Pertaining to the Homoëusians or their doctrines.

II. n. [cap.] A member of the orthodox party in the church during the great controversy upon the nature of Christ in the fourth century, who maintained that the essence of the Father and the Son is the same, in opposition to the Homoëusians or Semi-Arians, who held that their natures are only similar, and to the Heteroëusians or rigid Arians, who maintained that they are different.

On the one hand he [Origen] closely approaches the Nicene homoëusian by bringing the Son into union with the essence of the Father, and ascribing to him the attribute of eternity. Schaff, Christ and Christianity, p. 53.

homoëusie (hō-mō-ō-si), n. [Gr. ὁμοευσία, sameness of essence or of substance: see homoëusian.] Identity of substance or being. [Rare.]

So long (continues von Hartmann) as man considers God to be another than himself, or a being not identical with himself—i. e., to introduce a useful phrase, so long as he is in the stage of a heteroëusian religious consciousness—he desires as a substitute for the absent homoëusie or identity of being with God, a union as near, confident, and intimate as possible, through a personal relation of love.

Westminster Rev., CXXVI. 475.
homoëusious (hō-mō-ō'si-us), a. Eccles., essentially the same; of like essence or substance: in the Arian controversy, specifically noting the doctrine of those who held that the Son was the same in essence as the Father: opposed to heteroëusious.

homopathy (hō-mop'ā-thi), n. [Gr. ὁμοπάθεια, sameness of feelings, sympathy, < ὁμοπαθής, of like feelings or affections, sympathetic, < ὁμός, the same, + πάθος, feeling. Cf. homeopathy.] Similarity of feeling; sympathy. [Rare.]

That sympathy, or homopathy, which is in all animals to the same purpose. Cudworth, Intellectual System.

homopetalous (hō-mō-pet'ā-lus), a. [Gr. ὁμός, the same, + πέταλον, a leaf (petal).] In bot., having all the petals formed alike; having all the florets alike, as a composite flower.

homophone (hō-mō-fōn), n. [= F. homophone, etc., < Gr. ὁμόφωνος, of the same sound or tone, < ὁμός, the same, + φώνη, sound, voice.] 1. A letter or character expressing a like sound with another.—2. A word having the same sound as another, but differing in meaning and usually in derivation, and often in spelling; a homonym. Examples are air, air, air, air, eyre, eyre, heir; bare, bear, beard; floe, flow; no, no, know; so, sow, sew; ruff, rough; to, too, two; wait, weight.

We have in English the four homophones rite, write, right, and wright. Isaac Taylor, The Alphabet, I. 29.

3. Same as homophony.

homophonic (hō-mō-fon'ik), a. [As homophonous + -ic.] Same as homophonous.

homophonous (hō-mō-fō-nus), a. [Gr. ὁμοφώνος, of the same sound or tone: see homophone.]

1. Of the same pitch; of like sound. Specifically—(a) In anc. music, unisonous; in unison: opposed to antiphonic. (b) In mod. music, noting a passage or a style in which one part or melody greatly predominates in importance over all the others; monodic; monophonic: opposed to polyphonic.

2. In philol.: (a) Agreeing in sound but differing in sense. See homophone, 2. (b) Expressing the same sound or letter with another: as, a homophonous hieroglyphic.—Homophonous words or syllables, words or syllables having the same sound, although expressed in writing by various combinations of letters.

homophony (hō-mōf'ō-ni), n. [= F. homophonie, < Gr. ὁμοφωνία, unison, < ὁμός, of the same sound or tone: see homophone.] 1. Sameness of sound.—2. In music: (a) In anc. music, unison, or music in unison: opposed to antiphony. (b) In mod. music, monody; monophony: opposed to polyphony.

Also homophone.

homophyadic (hō'mō-fi-ad'ik), a. [Gr. ὁμός, the same, + MGr. φύας (φυνά-), a shoot, sucker, < φύεσθαι, grow.] In bot., characterized, as species of Equisetum, by the production of only one kind of stem, which bears both vegetative and fruitifying portions. See heterophyadic.

homophylic (hō-mō-fil'ik), a. [Gr. ὁμοφιλία, characterized by or pertaining to homophily.] Encyc. Brit., XVI. 845.

homophily (hō-mō-fil-i), n. [Gr. ὁμοφιλία, sameness of race, < ὁμός, the same, + φίλος, race, family.] Identity of genetic relationships: opposed to homomorphism.

homoplastic (hō-mō-plaz'mik), a. [Gr. ὁμοπλασμία, + -ic.] Same as homoplastic.

homoplasmy (hō-mō-plaz-mi), n. [Gr. ὁμός, the same, + πλάσμα, a thing molded, < πλάσσειν, mold, form.] The quality or condition of being homoplastic; homomorphism. The term was used by Thelston Dyer with reference to that mimetic resemblance which may exist, for example, between certain cacti and euphorbias.

homoplast (hō'mō-plast), n. [Gr. ὁμός, the same, + πλάσσειν, formed, molded, < πλάσσειν, form, mold.] 1. An organ or part corresponding in external form to another, though of distinct nature.—2. That which is homoplastic, as any aggregate or fusion of plastids: opposed to alloplast. Haeckel.

homoplastic (hō-mō-plas'tik), a. [As homoplast + -ic.] In biol. and bot., molded alike, or constructed in the same manner, but not having the same origin; analogical or adaptive, and not homological, in structure; homomorphous in texture: distinguished from homogenous or homogenetic. Also homoplastic.

Darwinian morphology has further rendered necessary the introduction of the terms homoplasmy and homoplasticity to express that close agreement in form which may be attained in the course of evolutionary changes by organs or parts in two animals which have been subjected to similar moulding conditions of the environment, but have no genetic community of origin, to account for their close similarity in form and structure. Encyc. Brit., XXIV. 808.

homoplasmy (hō'mō-plas'i), n. [Gr. ὁμός, the same, + πλάσσειν, a forming, molding, < πλάσσειν, mold, form.] The quality of being homoplastic; agreement in form and structure without community of origin, as of organs or parts of two different organs: opposed to homogeneity: correlated with analogy or heterology as distinguished from homology in biological senses. The conceptions expressed by the terms homoplasmy and homogeneity are little different from those for which analogy and homology were earlier and more widely used, as in such a familiar instance as that of the wing of the bat being analogous to the wing of the butterfly and homologous with the fore leg of a horse. But the conceptions now rest upon evolutionary considerations, and are more precisely predicable, as when an organ of one animal may be similar in form as well as function to that of another, and hence homoplastic, though having a different origination, and hence not homogenetic. See extract under homoplasticity.

The existence of these thread-cells is sufficiently remarkable, seeing that the Non-Palliate Opisthobranchs resemble in general form and habit the Planarian worms, many of which also possess thread-cells. But it is not conceivable that their presence is an indication of genetic affinity between the two groups, rather they are instances of homoplasmy. E. R. Lankester, Encyc. Brit., XVI. 659.

homopolar (hō-mō-pō-lar), a. [Gr. ὁμός, the same, + πόλος, pole, + -ar.] In morphology, having equal poles: said of the figures called stauraxonia homopolar. See stauraxonia.

homopolic (hō-mō-pol'ik), a. [Gr. ὁμός, the same, + πόλος, pole, + -ic.] Same as homopolar.

See extract under homomacronial. Encyc. Brit., XVI. 845.

homoproral (hō-mō-prō'ral), a. [Gr. ὁμός, the same, + L. prora, prora: see proral.] Having equal or similar prora, as a pterocymbia: opposed to heteroproral. See prora. Sollas.

homopter (hō-mop'ter), n. A homopterous insect; one of the Homoptera. Also homopteran, homopteron.

Homoptera (hō-mop'te-rā), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of homopter, having like wings: see homopterous.] 1. One of the two prime divisions of hemipterous insects founded by Latreille in 1817; a suborder of Hemiptera, contrasted with Heteroptera. It contains a very large number of bugs of the greatest diversity in form, normally with large wings, and hemelytra of like texture throughout (whence the name), which are usually folded in a slanting direction. They have a blunt face with inferior rostrum, eyes and ocelli usually present, antennae commonly inserted in a depression below the eyes, and legs adapted for either walking or leaping. The group is often elevated to the rank of an order. It is principally composed of the Cicadidae, of which the families are numerous, as Cicadidae, Fulgoroidea, Membracidae, Cercopidae, etc.; but it contains also the aphids or plant-lice, the coccids or scale-insects, the Aleurodidae, and Psyllidae, which are often grouped under the name Phytophthiria.

2. A group coextensive with the preceeding, except that the Phytophthiria are excluded. Auchenorhynchi is a synonym of Homoptera in this sense.

homopteran (hō-mop'te-ran), n. Same as homopter.

homopteron (hō-mop'te-ron), n. Same as homopter.

homopterous (hō-mop'te-rus), a. [NL. homopter, < Gr. ὁμόπτερος, of or with the same plumage (having like wings), < ὁμός, the same, + πτερόν, wing, feather.] Having wings of the same or like texture throughout; specifically, pertaining to or having the characters of the Homoptera.

homquinine (hō'mō-ki-nēn'), n. [Gr. ὁμός, the same, + E. quinine, q. v.] A natural alkaloid found in cinchona.

Homoraphidæ (hō-mō-raf'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. ὁμός, the same, + ῥάφις, a needle, < ῥάπτειν, sew, + -idæ.] A large family of marine sponges, of the suborder Halichondrina and the order Cornaciopongia. By Lendenfeld it is divided into numerous subfamilies and even lesser groups.

homorgan (hō'mōr-gan), n. [Gr. ὁμός, the same, + ὄργανον, organ.] In morphology, a similarly organized part; a homoplast: distinguished from alloplast. Haeckel. Also homo-organ.

homorganic (hō-mōr-gan'ik), a. [Gr. ὁμός, the same, + ὄργανον, organ, + -ic.] 1. Similarly organized.—2. Produced by the same organs.

It is maintained by some ancient grammarians that the hard aspirates are the hard letters k, t, p, together with the corresponding winds or homorganic winds.

Max Müller, Sci. of Lang., 2d ser., p. 161.

homoseismal (hō-mō-sis'mal), n. and a. [Gr. ὁμός, the same, + σεισμός, an earthquake: see seismic.] 1. n. The curve uniting points at which an earthquake-wave synchronously reaches the earth's surface: the equivalent of the German homoseiste, a term introduced into seismological science by K. von Seebach to replace the hybrid term coseismal, used by certain seismologists writing in English.

II. a. Pertaining to or having the character of such a curve.

homoseismic (hō-mō-sis'mik), a. Same as homoseismal.

homosporous (hō-mō-spō-rus), a. [Gr. ὁμός, similar, + σπόρος, seed.] Having only one kind of asexually produced spores. See heterosporous.

homostaura (hō-mō-stā'rā), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. ὁμός, the same, + σταυρός, a cross.] Homostaural figures, collectively considered.

The simpler group, the Homostaura, may have either an even or an odd number of sides. Encyc. Brit., XVI. 844.

homostaural (hō-mō-stā'ral), a. [As homostaura + -al.] In morphology, having a regular polygon as the base of a pyramidal figure: applied to the figures called stauraxonia homopolar: distinguished from heterostaural. See stauraxonia.

homostyled (hō'mō-stild), a. [Gr. ὁμός, the same, + στυλος, pillar: see style.] In bot., having styles of the same length and character: opposed to heterostyled. Darwin.

homotatic (hō-mō-tat'ik), a. [Gr. ὁμός, the same, + τάσις (rar-), strain, stress, < τείνειν, stretch.] In mech., pertaining to a homogeneous stress.—Homotatic coefficients, fifteen coefficients of the equation of a certain biquadratic surface, upon which the axes of direct elasticity of a body depend.

homotaxeous (hō-mō-tak'se-us), a. [Gr. ὁμοτάξις + -eous.] Same as homotaxial.

homotaxial (hō-mō-tak'si-al), a. [Gr. ὁμοτάξις + -al.] Of or pertaining to homotaxis; in geol., similarly disposed or arranged with reference to the order of succession of the overlying and underlying groups of fossiliferous strata, but not necessarily contemporaneous. Also homotaxic, homotaxeous.

When . . . the [geological] formations of distant countries are compared, all that we can safely affirm regarding them is that those containing the same or a representative assemblage of organic remains belong to the same epoch in the history of biological progress in each area. They are homotaxial; but we cannot assert that they are contemporaneous, unless we are prepared to include within that term a vague period of perhaps thousands of years. Geol. Encyc. Brit., X. 323.

homotaxially (hō-mō-tak'si-al-i), adv. In regard to or by homotaxis; with similar arrangement.

These Jurassic strata are evidently not homotaxially related to the other North American strata which have by some authors been referred to the Jurassic. Amer. Jour. Sci., 3d ser., XXIX. 232.

homotaxic (hō-mō-tak'sik), a. [The proper form would be homotactic*, < homotaxis (-tact-) + -ic.] Same as homotaxial. Huxley.

homotaxis (hō-mō-tak'sis), n. [NL., < Gr. ὁμός, the same, + τάξις, arrangement.] A term introduced into geology by Huxley, to express the idea of similarity of arrangement or of order in the fossiliferous deposits of various regions, while not necessarily including that of contemporaneity in the same: opposed to heterotaxis.

But the moment the geologist has to do with large areas or with completely separated deposits, then the mischief of confounding that "homotaxis" or "similarity of arrangement," which can be demonstrated with "synchrony" or "identity of date," for which there is not a shadow of proof, under the one common term of "contemporaneity" becomes incalculable. Huxley, Quart. Jour. Geol. Soc., 1862, No. 24, p. xli.

homotaxy (hō-mō-tak-si), n. [NL. homotaxis, q. v.] Same as homotaxis.

Homothalamæ (hō'mō-tha-lā'mō-ē), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. ὁμός, the same, + θάλαμος, a bed-chamber.] A division of lichens proposed by S. F. Gray, 1821, including his orders Collematidæ, Usneadæ, and Ramalinidæ. These with others are placed by Tuckerman in the Parmeliaceæ.

homothermous (hō-mō-thēr'mus), a. [Gr. ὁμός, the same, + θερμός, heat.] Having the same bodily temperature; preserving the same degree of animal heat.

Such homothermous animals as whales, seals, walrus. I. C. Rosse, Cruise of Corwin (1881), p. 12.

homothetic (hō-mō-thet'ik), a. [Gr. ὁμός, the same, + θετός, verbal adj. of τίθειναι, put, place: see thesis.] In geom., similar and similarly placed; in homology with reference to the line at infinity as axis of homology.

homotonous (hō-mōtō'nus), a. [L. homotonus, of the same tension, < Gr. ὁμότονος, of the same tone, < ὁμός, the same, + τόνος, tone.] Of the same tenor or tone; equable: applied to diseases which have a uniform tenor of rise, state, or declension.

homotony (hō-mōtō'ni), n. [Gr. ὁμός, as if homotonia*, < ὁμότονος, of the same tone: see homotonous.] The act of maintaining the same tone; monotony. [Rare.]

Thomson has often fallen into the homotony of the couplet. Loughorne, Effusions of Friendship.

homotropal (hō-mōtō'pāl), a. [As homotropous + -al.] Same as homotropous.

homotropous (hō-mōtō'pō-us), a. [Gr. ὁμότροπος, having the same turn, < ὁμός, the same, + τρέπω, turn.] Turned in the same direction as some other body, or directed in the same way as the body to which it belongs; specifically, in bot., curved or turned in one direction: applied also to the embryo of an anatropous or a campylotropous seed, in which the radicle is next the hilum. Gray. This term, which was early introduced by Richard, is synonymous with orthotropous as used by him: an unfortunate confusion, the ovule and the embryo being designated by the same term. It is, moreover, superfluous when the ovule or seed is stated to be anatropous or orthotropous.

homotypal (hō'mō-tī-pāl), a. [Gr. ὁμοτύπος + -al.] Same as homotypic.

Campylotropous Seed of Chickweed, with homotropous embryo.

It is the object of serial homology to determine homotypal parts.

homotypal (hō'mō-tip), n. [Gr. *ὁμοτύπος, having the same form (implied in deriv. ὁμοτυπία, sameness of form), < ὁμός, the same, + τύπος, impression, type, form.] In biol.: (a) That which is constructed on the same plan or type, as metameres of the body; that which exhibits serial homology. See homology. This is the original sense of the term, in which a homotype is a serial homologue, not an antitype or reversed repetition of another part. But serial parts may also be regarded as antitype or symmetrical. Hence—(b) An organ or part of an organ symmetrical with or equivalent to another organ or part of an organ on the opposite side of the body; an antitypical, correlative, or reversed repetition of a part across a given axis.

homotypic (hō-mō-tip'ik), a. [From homotype + -ic.] Pertaining to or of the nature of a homotype; of the same type; symmetrical with or corresponding to something else on the opposite part of the same axis. Thus, the right hand is homotypic of the left; the right and left eyes are homotypic.

homotypical (hō-mō-tip'i-ka), a. [From homotypic + -al.] Same as homotypic.

homotypy (hō'mō-ti-pi), n. [Gr. ὁμοτυπία, sameness of form: see homotype.] In biol.: (a) Serial homology; the structural correlation or correspondence between any two segments of the body. Thus, any vertebra compared with another, the shoulder compared with the hip, or the elbow with the knee, exhibits homotypy. But such parts may also be regarded as expressing symmetry, reversed repetition, or antitypy. Hence—(b) That kind of general homology which may be observed between parts or organs which are symmetrical, or fellows of each other, as right and left; the homology of reversed repetition of parts on opposite halves or across a given axis.

homuncle (hō'mung-kl), n. [L. homunculus: see homunculus.] Same as homunculus.

homuncular (hō-mung-kū-lār), a. [From homuncule + -ar.] Resembling or characteristic of a homunculus.

homunculus (hō-mung-kū'l), n. [L. homunculus: see homunculus.] Same as homunculus, 2. The giant saw the homunculus was frangible, and played upon him. C. Reade, Cloister and Hearth, vii.

homunculus (hō-mung-kū-lus), n.: pl. homunculi (-li). [L., dim. of homo (homin-, homon-), a man: see Homo.] 1. A tiny human being that may be produced (according to a fancy of Paracelsus) artificially, without a natural mother. Being produced by art, it was supposed that art was incarnate in it and that it had innate knowledge of secret things.

2. A little man; a dwarf.

homy (hō'mi), a. [From home + -y.] Pertaining to or resembling home; homelike. Also spelled homey. [Colloq.]

I saw . . . plenty of our dear English "lady's smock" in the wet meadows near here, which looked very homy. Kingsley, Life (1864), II. 168.

They [English drawing-rooms] have a homey look, which ours sometimes lack. Christian Union, June 30, 1887.

Hon. An abbreviation of honorable, used as a title.

hondt, n. An obsolete spelling of hand. Chaucer.

Honduras bark. See *bark*².

hone¹ (hōn), n. [ME. hone, hoone, a hone, < AS. hān, a stone (the dat. hāne is found twice in charters, in ref. to boundary-stones), = Icel. heinn, a hone, = Norw. heinn, heinn = Sw. henn, dial. heinn, a hone; perhaps = L. cinereus, a wedge (> E. *coin*¹, coign, quoins, q. v.), = Gr. kānos, a wedge, cone (> E. cone, q. v.), = Skt. gāna, a grindstone, < √ gā, to sharpen. The L. cos (cot-), a hone, is supposed to be from the same root.] 1. A stone used for sharpening instruments that require a delicate edge, and particularly for sharpening razors; an oilstone. A hone differs from a whetstone in being of finer grit and more compact texture. See honestone.

A Hone, a Bason, three Razors, and a Comb-case. Steele, Tender Husband, v. 1.

2. A thin piece of dry and stale bread; also, an oil-cake. [Prov. Eng.]—German hone, a soft, smooth, yellow stone obtained from the slate mountains near Ratibon, and used almost exclusively for razor-setting.

hone² (hōn), v. t.: pret. and pp. honed, ppr. honing. [ME. not found (cf. ME. hene, < AS. hēnan, stone, cast stones at); = Norw. heina, whet; from the noun.] To rub and sharpen on or as on a hone: as, to hone a razor.

Mr. Green . . . brought out a jack-knife, and commenced honing it on his shoe. J. T. Troubridge, Coupon Bonds, p. 286.

hone², v. i. [ME. honen, hoynen.] To linger; delay.

Good brother, let us weynd sons,
No longer here I rede we hone.
Towneley Mysteries, p. 11.

It may not helpe her for to hone, . . .
Than is goode tyme that we begynne.
York Plays, p. 349.

hone², n. [ME., < *hone*², v.] Delay; lingering.

Tharfore Eraclius ful sone Strake of his heuyd with-outen hone.
Holy Rood (E. E. T. S.), p. 127.

hone³ (hōn), v.: pret. and pp. honed, ppr. honing. [Prob. < F. hogner, formerly also hoigner, grumble, mutter, murmur, repine, whine, as a child or a dog, dial. (Norm.) honer, sing or hum in a low tone, houiner, lament.] I. intrans. To pine; long; yearn; moan. [Prov. Eng. and southern U. S.]

Some of the oxen in driving missed their fellows behind, and honing after them, bellowed, as their nature is.
Holland, tr. of Livy, p. 6.

Commending her, lamenting, honing, wishing himself anything for her sake.
Burton, Anat. of Mel., p. 525.

He lies pitying himself, honing and moaning over himself.
Lamb, The Convalscent.

Sometimes . . . I git kotch wid emptiness in de pit or de stummuck, an' git ter fairly honor arter sump'n w'at got substance in it. J. C. Harris, Uncle Remus, p. 193.

II. trans. To long for; crave. [Prov. Eng. and southern U. S.]

hone⁴ (hōn), n. A kind of swelling in the cheek.

hone⁵ (hōn), n. A circular barrow or hill.

Districts abounding in circular barrows, or, as they are here (in Yorkshire, England) called from the Norse name, hones, and, redundantly, hone-hills.
Archæologia, XLII. 170.

hone⁶ (hōn), n. pl. A dialectal contraction of hosen, plural of hose.

honest (on'est), a. [ME. honest, onest, < OF. honeste, later honneste, F. honnête (> D. Dan. honnēt = Sw. honnēt) = Pr. honnēt = Sp. Pg. honesto = It. onesto, < L. honestus, full of honor, honorable, worthy, virtuous, decent, < honor, honos, honor (see honor), + suffix -tus. The initial h in honest, honor, etc., is merely etymological, the sound having already disappeared when the word came into ME. use. See remarks under H, 1.] 1. Having a sense of honor; having honorable feelings, motives, or principles; free from deceit or hypocrisy; true, candid, upright, or just in speech and action; fair in dealing, or sincere in utterance; worthy to be trusted.

Be thou lowly and honest
To riche and pouere, in worde and dede,
And then thy name to worship shall sprede.
Booke of Precedence (E. E. T. S., extra ser.), i. 109.

Hee chides great men with most boldnesse, and is counted for it an honest fellow.
Ep. Earle, Micro-cosmographie, A Blunt Man.

This it is to have to do
With honest hearts: they easily may err,
But in the main they wish well to the truth.
Browning, Ring and Book, I. 271.

Specifically—(a) Having the virtue of chastity; chaste; virtuous: said of a woman.

Wives may be merry, and yet honest too.
Shak., M. W. of W., iv. 2.

Shee may be an honest woman, but is not beleue'd so in her Parish, and no man is a greater Infidel in it then her Husband.
Ep. Earle, Micro-cosmographie, A Handsome Hostesse.

(b) Having no disposition to cheat, steal, or lie.

There's an honest conscionable fellow; he takes but ten shillings of a bellows mender.
Middleton, The Phoenix, iv. 1.

An honest treasurer, like a black-plumed swan,
Not every day our eyes may look upon.
O. W. Holmes, The School-Boy.

2. Characterized by or proceeding from honorable motives or principles; marked by truth, justice, sincerity, fairness, etc.: as, an honest transaction; honest opinions or motives; an honest effort.

Hall, Chron., p. 226.

I beseech you to remember me when you talk with your good God, that he may give me the strength of his Spirit, that I manfully yielding my life for his truth may do you some honesty, who have put me into his service.

J. Careless, in Bradford's Works (Parker Soc., 1853), II. 406.

5. In bot., a name of several plants, especially of a small cruciferous plant, Lunaria annua (L. biennis): so called from the transparency of its dissepiments. The perennial honesty is Clematis vitalba.—Syn. 1. Honesty, Honor, Integrity, Probity, Rectitude, Uprightness; equity, trustworthiness, trustiness, fidelity, fairness, candor, veracity, plain-dealing, frankness. The first six words apply primarily to the spirit of the person, and by extension to conduct, etc. They may be negative or positive, expressing the spirit or the act of refraining or of doing. Honesty belongs to the absolute principle of right; honor, on the other hand, belongs to accepted standards of what is due to others or to one's self. Conformity to an exalted standard of honor is more creditable and illustrious than simple honesty. In earlier usage honest and honesty retained much of their Latin significance of honorabile and honorableness in the objective sense. (See Rom. xii. 17.) Integrity means soundness, and is used with especial reference to trusts (as, a man of strict business integrity), but it may consider a person as inspected and found whole by others or by himself. Probity is tested honesty, tried and proved integrity. Rectitude and uprightness draw their meanings from the idea of standing up straight, and hence matching the standard of right, but uprightness is more manifestly connected with this idea, and hence, as well as on account of its native origin, is much the more vigorous of the two. See justice.

"Honesty is the best policy," but he who acts on that principle is not an honest man. Whately.

The sense of honour is of so fine and delicate a nature that it is only to be met with in minds which are naturally noble, or in such as have been cultivated by great examples, or a refined education.

Addison, Guardian, No. 161.

He [Savage] had not sufficient resolution to sacrifice the pleasure of affluence to that of integrity. Johnson.

Of commercial fame, but more

Famed for thy probity from shore to shore.

Cowper, in Memory of John Thornton.

The command of the political ruler is at first obeyed, not because of its perceived rectitude, but simply because it is his command, which there will be a penalty for disobeying.

H. Spencer, Data of Ethics, § 44.

I know also, my God, that thou . . . hast pleasure in uprightness.

1 Chron. xxix. 17.

honestwort (hōn'wért), n. [*hone*⁴ + *wort*¹] A name applied to several umbelliferous plants, as Sison Anomum, the stone-parsley, Trinia vulgaris, and Cryptotaenia Canadensis: so named because formerly used to cure the swelling called a hone.

honey (hun'i), n. and a. [Early mod. E. also hony, hony; < ME. hony, huny, humi, huni; < AS. huni; < OS. honey, hanig = OFries. huni; < MD. honing, honing, D. honi = MLG. honnich, LG. honi = OHG. honag, honang, MHG. honey, honi, G. honi = Icel. hunang = Sw. honung, honing = Dan. honing, honey; root unknown. The Goth. word is different, milith = Gr. μέλι (melē) = L. mel, etc.: see midew, mell.] I. n. 1. A sweet viscid fluid collected from the nectaries of flowers and elaborated for food by several kinds of insects, especially by the honey-bee, Apis mellifica. It is deposited by the honey-bee in the cells of the honeycomb. Honey, when pure, is of a whitish color tinged with yellow, of a spicy sweetness and an agreeable smell; it is soluble in water, and becomes viscous by fermentation. It is essentially a solution of dextrose and levulose with volatile oils and occasionally cane-sugar. Bees often fill their cells with other substances than the nectar of flowers, as molasses, honeydew, or the juices of fruits, but the product is not true honey.

Thy mete shall be mylk, honye, & wyne;

Now, dere soule, lett us go dyne.

Political Poems, etc. (ed. Furnivall), p. 157.

The yellow-banded bees . . .

Fed thee, a child, lying alone . . .

With whitest honey in fairy gardens cull'd.

Tennyson, Eleonore.

2. Figuratively, sweetness or charm.

I, of ladies most deject and wretched,

Honeying and making love.

Shak., Hamlet, iii. 4.

honey-ant (hun'i-ant), n. An ant of the genus Myrmecocystus, as M. mexicanus or M. melliger, of southwestern North America. The latter is found at an elevation of from 6,000 to 7,500 feet. In one form of the workers the abdomen is found in summer distended with honey to the size of a pea or a small grape, and appears pellucid. Later in the season, when food is scarce, these animated stores of honey are devoured by the other ants, and they are also dug up and eaten by the inhabitants of the country. See honey-beaver.

The honey-ants are a nocturnal species.

R. A. Proctor, Nature Studies, p. 24.

honey-badger (hun'i-baj'ér), n. The ratel, Mellivora ratellus: so called from its fondness for honey.

honey-bag (hun'i-bag), n. An enlargement of the alimentary canal of the bee in which it carries its load of honey. This enlargement is in the esophagus or gullet, and corresponds to the sucking-stomach or crop of other Hymenoptera and of Lepidoptera and Diptera. In it the bee stores the honey gathered from flowers, which it disgorges into the cells of the honeycomb. Also called honey-stomach.

And, good monsieur, have a care the honey-bag break not;

I would be loth to have you over-flow with a honey-bag, signior.

Shak., M. N. D., iv. 1.

honey-balm (hun'i-bām), n. A European labiate plant, Melittis melissophyllum.

honey-basket (hun'i-bās'ket), n. In entom., the corbiculum or structure on the legs of bees in which pollen mingled with honey is conveyed to the hive. See cut under corbiculum.

honey-bear (hun'i-bār), n. 1. An East Indian bear, Mellursus or Prochilus labiatus; the sloth-bear or aswail. See cut under aswail.—2. The kinkajou, Cercopithecus caudivolvulus. See cut under kinkajou.

honey-bearer (hun'i-bār'ér), n. One of the honey-ants whose office it is to receive and carry in its abdomen the honey which has been gathered by the workers.

The workers take it [the honey] home with them and give it to the honey-bearers, who swallow . . . it. . . . keep it in their crops ready for use, exactly as bees keep it in cells. . . . The honey-bearers, in short, have been converted into living honey-jars. When the workers are hungry they caress a honey-bearer and . . . sip it [the honey] from her throat.

R. A. Proctor, Nature Studies, p. 24.

honey-bee (hun'i-bē), n. A bee that collects and stores honey; specifically, the hive-bee, Apis mellifica. See cuts under bee.

So work the honey-bees;

Creatures that, by a rule in nature, teach

The art of order to a peopled kingdom.

Shak., Hen. V., i. 2.

honeyberry (hun'i-ber'i), n.; pl. honeyberries (-iz). 1. The berry of Celtis australis.—2. The berry of Melicocca bijuga.

honey-bird (hun'i-bērd), n. 1. A bird which feeds on the sweets of flowers; one of the Nectarinidae or Meliphagidae; a honey-sucker.—2. Same as honey-guide.—3. A bee. Davies. [Rare.]

The world have but one God, Heav'n but one Sun,

Quails but one Chief, the Honey-birds but One,

One Master-Bee.

Sylvester, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, ii., The Captains.

honey-blob (hun'i-blob), n. The gooseberry. [Scotch.]

He saw out of the coach-window a woman selling the sweet yellow gooseberries. . . . and he cried, "Gie me a ha'porth of honeyblobs."

E. B. Ramsay, Scottish Life and Character, p. 254.

honey-bloom (hun'i-blōm), n. The spreading dog's-bane or Indian hemp, Apocynum androsaemifolium, a common American plant.

honey-bread (hun'i-bred), n. A small leguminous tree, Ceratonia Siliqua, a native of the Mediterranean region. Also called St. John's bread. See cut under Ceratonia.

honey-brown (hun'i-broun), n. In entom., a pale-yellowish and generally somewhat translucent brown.

honey-buzzard (hun'i-buz'ārd), n. A bird of prey of the genus Pernis, subfamily Buteoninae, and family Falconidae; a pern. The common European species, P. apivora, is also found in Africa. It does not eat honey, but breaks into the nests of bees and wasps to get at their larvae.

honey-cell (hun'i-sel), n. A cell in a honeycomb.

His [Emerson's] laconic phrases are the honey-cells of thought.

E. C. Steedman, Poets of America, p. 172.

honeycomb (hun'i-kōm), n. [< ME. honeycomb, honeycomb, honeycoom, huny-camb, < AS. hunig-camb, < hunig, honey, + camb, comb. The name is not found outside of E.; other words for 'honeycomb' are D. honigzeem = Icel. hunnags-seimr, lit. 'honey-string'; Sw. honungskaka = Dan. honningkage, lit. 'honey-cake'; G. honigscheibe, lit. 'honey-shive', or honig-wabe, lit. 'honey-cake', bienen-wabe, lit. 'bee-cake', or simply wabe, lit. 'cake' or 'wafer', or 'waffle': see wafer, waffle. The L. term was favus (see favus), the Gr., μελικρις or μελικριον.] 1. A structure of wax of a firm texture, consisting of hexagonal cells with concave bottoms ranged side by side, formed by bees for the reception of honey and of their eggs.

And they gave him a piece of a broiled fish, and of an honeycomb.

Luke xiv. 42.

I have eaten my honeycomb with my honey. Cant. v. 1.

And well his words became him: was he not

A full-cell'd honeycomb of eloquence Stored from all flowers? Tennyson, Edwin Morris.

2†. Sweet one; darling: a trivial term of endearment. Compare honey, 3.

What do ye, hony comb, sweets Alison?

Chaucer, Miller's Tale, l. 512.

3. Any substance, as a casting of iron, etc., having cells like those of a honeycomb.

A scratch or spot of honey-comb in the grooves renders the rifle completely useless for match-shooting.

W. W. Greener, The Gun, p. 146.

Specifically—4. In mammal., the reticulum or second stomach of a ruminant. See cut under ruminant.—Honeycomb bottom, same as honey-pipe bottom (which see, under honey-pipe).—Honeycomb decoration, in ceram., a name given to the Mayflower decoration, from the resemblance of the crowded blossoms to a honeycomb.—Honeycomb moth, a timid moth of the genus Galeria, which infests beehives, depositing its eggs in the comb, where the larvae are developed and undergo their transformations. G. ceranae or mellonella, about an inch long, and G. alvearia, about half an inch, are perhaps the worst enemies of the bee. See cut under beemoth.—Honeycomb sponge, the grass-sponge.—Honeycomb stitch, a stitch used in producing gathers, as in the stiff material used for smock-frocks and the like, the result being a pattern of lozenges covering the whole surface, held at their intersections by loops of thread, usually of a different color from that of the material.—Honeycomb tripe, the part of tripe which is honeycombed or divided into numerous small cells. It is the second stomach of a ruminant, or second part of the cardiac division of the whole stomach, next to the paunch proper or rumen, and is technically called the reticulum. See cut under ruminant.—Honeycomb work, a name given to ancient representations of armor of a flexible character, as the hauberk or brigogne. They show a series of open hexagons, separated by a slender bar or ridge, or sometimes openings more nearly approaching the form of circles. They may be assumed to represent indifferently chain-mail or a garment of fence made by sewing rings or small plates of metal on leather or linen.

honeycomb (hun'i-kôm), v. t. [< honeycomb, n.] To fill with cells or holes, as wood or earth, by perforation or excavation, in the manner of a honeycomb.

The rock itself over which the fort was raised is honey-combed with excavated passages for infantry and cavalry. J. A. Symonds, Italy and Greece, p. 180.

There is the insignificant-looking worm, the "jengen," which insidiously honeycombs the poles.

Elect. Rev. (Amer.), II. 7.

honeycombed (hun'i-kômd), a. 1. Perforated or excavated like a honeycomb; specifically, having little cells, as cast metal when not solid.

This geyser presents a shallow basin, with rather ill-defined margin, formed of thin plates of honeycombed geyserite.

Science, IV. 22.

2. Decorated with a honeycomb pattern—either the Mayflower pattern or one of hexagons.

honeycombing (hun'i-kô-ming), n. [Verbal n. of honeycomb, v.] An ornamental pattern produced in thin material by running stitches diagonally across the fabric, and drawing up these threads so that the lozenge-shaped spaces between them shall be puffed and in relief; smoking.

honey-creeper (hun'i-krê"për), n. Any bird of the American family Certhiidae or Dacnidiidae; a guittuit. The species are quite numerous; one, Certhiola bahamensis, occurs in the United States. See cut under Certhiidae.

honey-crock (hun'i-krok), n. A crock or pot of honey.

Like foolish fish about an honey-crocks.

Spenser, F. Q., v. II. 33.

honeydew (hun'i-dû), n. [= D. honigdaauw = G. honigthau = Dan. honningdug (cf. Sw. honningssag); as honey + dew. Cf. honey-rose and midew.] 1. A saccharine substance found on the leaves of trees and other plants in small drops like dew. There are two kinds, one secreted from the plants, and the other by plant-lice, bark-lice, and leaf-hoppers. Bees and ants are said to be fond of honeydew. The name is properly applied to the sugary secretion from the leaves of plants, occurring most frequently in hot weather. It usually appears as small glistening drops, but if particularly abundant may drip from the leaves in considerable quantity, when it has been called manna. The manna-ash, Fraxinus Ornus, exhibits this phenomenon, as does Carduus arctioides.

For he on honey-dew hath fed,
And drunk the milk of Paradise.

Coleridge, Kubla Khan.

Although further and thorough investigation is necessary to establish the fact, this will be the final solution—that the honey-dew is largely the product of the Pulvinaria, the sap being by it extracted from the tree, and elaborated by the insect organism into this sweet substance, as is a similar or perhaps identical substance by some of the Aphides, and honey by the honey-bee. Science, III. 737.

2. A kind of chewing-tobacco prepared with molasses. [Trade-name.]

honeydewed (hun'i-dûd), a. [< honeydew + -ed.] Covered with honeydew.

Three accounts have been published in Eastern Prussia of white and white-spotted horses being greatly injured by eating mildewed and honeydewed vetches. Darwin, Var. of Animals and Plants, p. 331.

honey-eater (hun'i-ê"tër), n. One who or that which eats honey. Specifically—(a) Any bird of the family Meliphagidae; a honey-sucker. (b) A honey-bee.

honeyed (hun'id), p. a. [Also honeyed; < honey + -ed.] 1. Covered with, abounding in, or as sweet as honey.

Fair was the day, the honeyed beanfield's scent
The west wind bore unto him.

William Morris, Earthly Paradise, I. 379.

Hence—2. Sweet; dulcet; soothing; mollifying; as, honeyed words.

When he speaks,
The air, a charter'd libertine, is still,
And the mute wonder lurketh in men's ears,
To steal his sweet and honey'd sentences.

Shak., Ben. V., i. 1.

The honeyed breath of praise, O. W. Holmes, Agnes.

honeyedness (hun'id-nés), n. Sweetness; allurements.

honey-flower (hun'i-flou"ër), n. A plant of the genus Melianthus, ornamental shrubs from the Cape of Good Hope, the flowers of which yield much honey.

honey-fly, n. A honey-bee.

Up, up, ye princes! prince and people, rise,
And run to schools among the honey-flies.
Du Bartas (trans.).

honeyfogle (hun'i-fû"gl), v. t.; pret. and pp. honeyfugled, ppr. honeyfugling. [< honey + fogle*, of no appar. origin, and prob. a mere addition.] To cajole; wheedle. [Slang; southern and western U. S.]

honey-garlic (hun'i-gär"lik), n. A plant of the genus Nectarosordum, natural order Liliaceae, placed by Bentham and Hooker under Allium. N. siculum (the Allium siculum of authors) is native of Sicily. It has a slender flower-scape 3 or 4 feet high, with a cluster of long, pendulous green or purplish flowers having honey-pots.

honey-guide (hun'i-gid), n. A non-passerine African bird of the family Indicatoridae, supposed to guide the honey-hunters to their spoil; an indicator. Also called honey-bird.

honeyless (hun'i-les), a. [< honey + -less.] Destitute of honey.

But for your words, they rob the Hybla bees,
And leave them honeyless.
Shak., J. C., v. 1.

honey-locust (hun'i-lô"kust), n. An ornamental North American tree, Gleditsia triacanthos. The water honey-locust is G. monoerma, also an American tree, growing from Illinois southward. The name is sometimes given to the mesquit, Prosopis juliflora, a native of the southwestern United States.

At sunset he stood under the honey-locust tree on the levee, where he was wont to find his father waiting for him.
G. W. Cable, The Century, XXXV. 550.

honey-lotus (hun'i-lô"tus), n. A name sometimes given to Melilotus alba, the white melilot or sweet clover, a widely distributed European plant thoroughly naturalized in America.

honey-mesquit (hun'i-mes-kêt'), n. The algaroba or mesquit, Prosopis juliflora, a small tree of the southwestern United States. Also called honey-pod and sometimes honey-locust.

honey-month (hun'i-munth), n. Same as honey-moon. [Rare.]

Sometimes the parties fly asunder even in the midst of courtship, and sometimes grow cool in the very honey-month.
Tatler, No. 192.

honeymoon (hun'i-môn), n. [< honey + moon, 'month.' Cf. honeymooning.] 1. The first month after marriage; the interval, of whatever length, commonly spent by a newly married couple in traveling, visiting, or other recreation, before settling down to their ordinary occupations.

I was more than once nearly choked with gall during the honeymoon, and had lost all comfort in life before my friends had done wishing me joy.

Sheridan, School for Scandal, I. 2.

Hence—2. A time of prosperity or enjoyment; an occasion of advantage.

I was there entertained as well by the great friends my father made, as by mine own forwardness, where, it being now but honey-moone, I endeavoured to court it.

Lyly, Euphues.

honeymoon (hun'i-môn), v. i. [< honeymoon, n.] To keep one's honeymoon; take a wedding-trip.

So do not I, dear, till I have found some decent sort of body to honeymoon along with me.

Trollope, Dr. Thorne, iv.

As soon as I can get his discharge, and he has done honeymooning, we shall start.

T. Hughes, Tom Brown at Oxford, xlvii.

to the Meliphagidae, and less technically to sundry other small, chiefly slender-billed, birds, as the Nectariniidae, Certhiidae, etc.

honeysuckle (hun'i-suk'l), n. [< ME. honey-socle, hunigsocle (the alleged AS. hunigsocle* is due to a mistake), a dim. form of the more common ME. honysocke, < AS. hunisuce, hunisuge, hunigsuge, < hunig, honey, + sucan, sugan, suck: see honey and suck.] The name was applied to various plants, the ME. forms being variously glossed ligustrum (privet), locusta (for ligustrum?), cerifolium (chervil), serpillum (wild thyme), apiago (which elsewhere glosses AS. beowyr, 'bee-wort'; and MHG. binsuge, binesaug, as if 'bee-suck'); the AS. forms are always glossed ligustrum (privet). The name means 'a plant from which honey is sucked,' namely by bees, as the name apiago (< L. apis, a bee) and the MHG. binsuge, above mentioned, indicate. Other names are E. woodbine, ML. caprifolium (glossing ME. woodebynde, woodbine), D. kamperfoelie, F. chèvrefeuille, etc. (see caprifole, caprifolium), G. geissblatt, lit. 'goat-leaf,' etc.] 1. A name of upright or climbing shrubs of the genus Lonicera, natural order Caprifoliaceae, natives of the temperate parts of both hemispheres. They have entire opposite leaves, and axillary, often fragrant, white, red, or yellow flowers, which are succeeded by sweetish red or purple berries. The common honeysuckle, L. Periclymenum, a native of central and western Europe, cultivated in the United States, is also known by the name of woodbine, and is probably the 'twisted eglantine' of Milton. L. Caprifolium, which is frequent in gardens, and is characterized by the upper pairs of leaves being united into a cup, and L. Xylosteum, the fly-honeysuckle, are also found in England, the latter only being probably native. L. sempervirens (trumpet or coral honeysuckle), a native of North America, is cultivated on account of the beauty of its large flowers, which are red on the outside and yellowish within. L. ciliata is the American fly-honeysuckle; it has a honey-yellow corolla slightly tinged with purple. L. flexuosa is the Chinese honeysuckle, and L. Tatarica the Tatarian honeysuckle. The bark of L. corymbosa is used for dyeing black in Chili, and the berries of L. carulea are a favorite food of the Kamtschadals.

Flowering Branch and Fruit of Trumpet or Coral Honeysuckle (Lonicera sempervirens). a, flower; b, fruit.

So doth the woodbine the sweet honey-suckle Gently entwist.
Shak., M. N. D., iv. 1.

I left this place, and saw a brother of the angle sit under that honey-suckle hedge, one that will prove worthy your acquaintance.
I. Walton, Complete Angler, p. 111.

I sat me down to watch upon a bank
With ivy canopied, and interwove
With flaunting honey-suckle.
Milton, Comus, l. 545.

2. A plant of some other genus. The name honey-suckle is very generally applied in northern New England to the genus Aquilegia, of the natural order Ranunculaceae, and particularly to the native wild columbine, A. Canadensis. The African fly-honey-suckle is Halleria lucida, of the natural order Scrophulariaceae; the Australian honey-suckles belong to the genus Banksia, natural order Proteaceae, as B. serrata and B. integrifolia. The bush-honey-suckles, of the genus Diervillea (a near relative of Lonicera, the true honey-suckle), are low shrubs of North America, China, and Japan extensively cultivated for their profuse, mostly rose-colored flowers. The dwarf honey-suckle is Cornus suecica, of the natural order Cornaceae, a native of north temperate or arctic countries; the French honey-suckle is Hedysarum coronarium, of the natural order Leguminosae; the ground-honey-suckle is Lotus corniculatus, of the natural order Leguminosae; the New Zealand honey-suckle is Knightsia excozela, of the natural order Proteaceae; the Tasmanian honey-suckle is Banksia australis; the West Indian honey-suckle is Tecoma capensis; the purple honey-suckle or azalea is Rhododendron nudiflorum; the white honey-suckle is Rhododendron macranthum, of the natural order Ericaceae. Various species of Desmodium are also so called. See Banksia, Diervillea, Lonicera, Cornus, Hedysarum, Desmodium, Halleria, Tecoma, Rhododendron.

According to Culpepper, the white honey-suckle and red honey-suckle were names of the white and red sorts of meadow trefoil. In the West of England the red clover is still called honey-suckle.
Halliwell.

3. The flower of any of the above plants.

Woodbine that beareth the honey-suckle.
Barret, Alvearie, 1580.

honey-suckle-apple (hun'i-suk-l-ap'l), n. A fungus, Ecobasidium Azaleae, occurring on the branches of Rhododendron (Azalea) nudiflorum. It is eaten by children. Also called swamp-apple. [New Eng.]

honey-suckle-clover (hun'i-suk-l-klō'vēr), n. The common white clover, Trifolium repens.

honey-suckled (hun'i-suk'ld), a. [honey-suckle + -ed².] Covered with honey-suckles.

honey-suckle-tree (hun'i-suk-l-trē), n. A plant of the genus Banksia, natural order Proteaceae, of several species, particularly B. marginata (B. australis), B. collina, B. latifolia, and B. ericifolia. They are large shrubs or small trees, natives of Australia, New South Wales, and Tasmania, the flowers of which yield an abundance of honey.

honey-sugar (hun'i-shūg'ār), n. The solid constituent of honey after granulation. It is said to be chiefly glucose.

honey-sweet (hun'i-swēt), n. The meadow-sweet, Spiraea ulmaria.

honey-sweet (hun'i-swēt), a. [ME. hony-sweete = D. honigsot, etc.] Sweet as honey.

For which this Januarie of whom I tolde, Considered hath in with his dayes olde,
The lusty Iy, the vertuous quyetie,
That is in marriage hony-sweete.

Chaucer, Merchant's Tale, l. 152.
Prithce, honey-sweet husband, let me bring thee to Staines.
Shak., Hen. V., ii. 3.

honey-tongued (hun'i-tungd), a. Speaking sweetly, softly, or winningly.

Conscience, that will not die in debt,
Pay him the due of honey-tongued Boyet.
Shak., I. L. L., v. 2.

honey-tube (hun'i-tūb), n. In entom., one of the siphonets or small tubular projections on the upper surface of the abdomen of an aphid: so called because a sweet fluid called honeydew is extruded from them.

honeyware (hun'i-wär), n. Same as badderlocks.

honeywort (hun'i-wört), n. 1. The crosswort, Galium cruciata.—2. A plant of the genus Cerinth, of the natural order Boraginaceae. C. major is a small European annual. The rough honeywort is C. aspera. It grows about a foot high, and has oval, stem-clasping, bluish-green leaves, with white rough dots, and racemes of purplish flowers, which secrete much honey.

hong¹, v. An obsolete form of hang.

hong² (hong), n. [Chin. hang, from China hong, a row or series.] 1. A Chinese warehouse, consisting of a succession of rooms or store-houses.—2. Formerly, as used by the Chinese, one of the foreign factories maintained at Canton in the early days of trade with China; now, any foreign mercantile establishment in China, Japan, etc.—Hong merchants, a body of from eight to twelve Chinese merchants at Canton, who once had the sole privilege of trading with Europeans, and were responsible for the conduct of the foreigners with whom they dealt; and for their payment of customs-duties. By the treaty of 1842 their peculiar functions ceased.

honiet, n. An obsolete spelling of honey.

honied, p. a. See honeyed.

honiset, honisht, v. t. [ME. honisen, hunyischen, < OF. honis-, stem of certain parts of honir, hounir = Fr. aumir = It. onire, < OHG. hōnyan (= Goth. hawjan = AS. hynan), disgrace, degrade, shame.] To destroy; ruin.

He [God] fyndeth al fayre a freke with-inne
That hert honest and hol, that hathel he honourez . . .
And harde honysez thise other and of his erde flemez [banishes from his abode].

Aliterative Poems (ed. Morris), ii. 596.

honi soit qui mal y pense. See Order of the Garter, under garter.

Honiton lace. See lace.

honk (hongk), n. [Imitative.] The cry of the wild goose.

I heard the tread of a flock of geese, or else ducks, on the dry leaves in the woods by a pondhole behind my dwelling, where they had come up to feed, and the faint honk, or quack, of their leader as they hurried off.

Thoreau, Walden, p. 267.

honk (hongk), v. i. [honk, n.] To emit the cry of the wild goose.

As the air grows colder, the long wedges of geese flying south, with their commodore in advance, and honking as they fly, are seen high up in the heavens.

O. W. Holmes, Old Vol. of Life, p. 169.

The sound of the heavy wing strokes [of geese] and the honking seemed directly overhead.

T. Roosevelt, Hunting Trips, p. 61.

honker (hong'kēr), n. That which honks, as a goose; specifically, the common wild goose of America, the Canada goose, Bernicla canadensis. See cut under Bernicla. [U. S.]

My first Honker. Well do I remember the morning on which he measured his length on the grass and flopped his life out in vain attempts to rise.

Forest and Stream, May 22, 1884.

Pretty soon a big flock [of wild geese], led by an old honker, comes sailin' along, sees our decoys, an' lights.
New York Evening Post, Aug. 23, 1885.

honor, honour (on'or), n. [The second spelling is still prevalent in England; early mod. E. honor, honour, < ME. honour, honor, honur, pronounced and sometimes written without the aspirate, onour, onur (earliest form in -ur), < AF. honur, later honor, honour, OF. honur, hunur, honor, honour, hounour, onor, ounor, ounour, even enor, enur, emur, amnor (the accent being on the last syllable), later honor, honneur, F. honneur = Pr. honor, onor = Sp. Pg. honor = It. onore, < L. honor, honos (honōr-) (the form honos being the older, and that which is used almost exclusively in Cicero), honor, repute, etc.]; 1. Root unknown. Hence ult. honest, etc.] 1. Respect blended with some degree of reverence; esteem due to worth or exalted merit of any kind; deferential approbation or admiration.

For men sold hath that haly tre

In honore als it aw to be.

Holy Rood (E. E. T. S.), p. 123.

Thou art clothed with honour and majesty. Ps. civ. 1.

A prophet is not without honour, save in his own country. Mat. xiii. 57.

But what is this honour, I mean honour indeed, and that which ought to be so dear unto us, other than a kind of history, or fame following actions of virtue?

Raleigh, Hist. World, v. iii. § 2.

Fortune placed him [James I.] in a situation in which his weaknesses covered him with disgrace, and in which his accomplishments brought him no honour.

Macaulay, Lord Bacon.

2. Personal title to high respect or esteem; elevation of character; a controlling sense of what is right, true, and due; probity of feeling and conduct: often applied specifically to loyalty and high courage in men and chastity in women, as virtues of the highest consideration.

To extort and take away the right of the poor is against the honor of the king. Latimer, 1st Sermon bef. Edw. VI., 1549.

Heaven so comfort me

As I am free from foul pollution

With any man! my honour ta'en away,

I am no woman.

Beau. and Fl., Scornful Lady, v. 2.

From the field of Pavia, where France suffered one of the greatest reverses in her annals, Francis writes to his mother: "All is lost except honor." Swanneur, Orations, i. 60.

A man of a nice sense of honor is one who is punctilious in doing things which he could not be punished for neglecting, and whose neglect would arouse but little disapprobation.

C. Mercier, Mind, X. 13.

3. A state, condition, circumstance, or character which confers or attracts high consideration and respect; hence, a person of such condition or character; a source or ground of esteem, respect, or consideration, as elevated rank, dignity, conduct, etc.: as, a post of honor; I have not the honor of his acquaintance; he is an honor to his country.

He preide god yewe hem good a-venture and grace to do so that it myght be suvation to theire soules, and honour to theire soules, and honour to theire bodies.

Merlin (E. E. T. S.), iii. 580.

Erasmus, the honour of learning of all our time, saide wiselike that experience is the common scholehouse of foies, and ill men. Ascham, The Scholemaster, p. 62.

But a trouble weigh'd upon her,
And perplex'd her, night and morn,
With the burthen of an honour
Unto which she was not born.

Tennyson, Lord of Burleigh.

Hence—4. That which attracts respect or admiration; distinction; adornment.

Therefore he bids thee stand, thou proud man,
Whilst, with the whisking of my sword about,
I take thy honours off.

Fletcher (and another), Noble Gentleman, v. 1.

The grateful tree was pleas'd with what he said,
And shook the shady honours of her head.
Dryden, tr. of Ovid's Metamorph., i. 769.

He spoke, and speaking in proud triumph spread
The long-contended honours of her head.
Pope, R. of the L., iv. 140.

5. A manifestation or token of esteem; a mark of respect, distinction, or high consideration; as, to do one honor; the honor of knighthood; the honors of war; military honors.

That it myght you please me do such honore
That ye the Armes wold fouchesse to bere Off Luxembourgh.

Rom. of Partenay (E. E. T. S.), l. 2041.

Others . . . came, and were healed: who also honoured us with many honours. Acts xxviii. 9, 10.

She may help you to many fair preferments, . . .
And lay these honours on your high desert.

Shak., Rich. III., i. 3.

We will do him

No customary honour: since the knight
Came not to us, of us to claim the prize, Ourselves will send it after.

Tennyson, Lancelot and Elaine.

6. With a possessive personal pronoun, a deferential title of address or denotation formerly used for men of superior condition generally, but now (except as a mark of servility) restricted in England to the holders of certain offices, particularly judges, including those of the county courts, and in the United States to mayors, judges, and magistrates: as, your honor; his honor the judge.

Your honours shall perceive how I will work
To bring this matter to the wished end.

Shak., 1 Hen. VI., iii. 3.

My master (said I) . . . is come to Bath to recruit. . . . I told Thomas that your Honour had already indicted five disbanded chairmen.

Sheridan, The Rivals, ii. 1.

"Judge—your honor—" said Mr. Bendir, "I am entered here, so to speak, as a defendant."

W. A. Butler, Mrs. Limber's Raffle, ix.

7. In Eng. law, a seigniorship of several manors held under one baron or lord paramount. Although it was not a distinct organization, but an aggregate of several manors, one court-baron was often held for the whole, but regarded as the court of each several manor. The name seems also to have been sometimes applied to a single great manor, escheating to the king, and farmed out for him, or granted by him anew.

A Man possessed of five Barldoms, Lancaster, Leicester, Fferrers, Lincoln, and Salisbury, besides the Liberties of Pickering, and the Honour of Cockermore.

Baker, Chronicles, p. 106.

8. In whist, one of the four highest trump-cards. See whist.

Honours—i. e. ace, king, queen, and knave of trumps—are thus reckoned: (i) if a player and his partner, either separately or conjointly, hold—(a) the four honours, they score four points; (ii) any three honours, they score two points; (iii) only two honours, they do not score.

Club Code, quoted in Encyc. Brit., XXIV. 546.

9. pl. Civilities paid; hospitalities or courtesies rendered, as at an entertainment.

As I was introduced [to the Greek patriarch] by the dragoman, or interpreter from the consul, I had all the honours done me that are usual at an eastern visit.

Pococke, Description of the East, i. 15.

Then hire a slave, or (if you will) a lord,
To do the honours, and to give the word.

Pope, Imit. of Horace, i. vi. 100.

Neither is it slight praise to say of a woman that she does well the honors of her house in the way of hospitality.

Marg. Fuller, Woman in 19th Cent., p. 262.

A very old man (a fragment, like the castle itself) emerged from some crumbling corner to do me the honours.

H. James, Jr., Little Tour, p. 189.

10. Special rank or distinction conferred by a university, college, or school upon a student for eminence in scholarship or success in some particular subject: usually in the plural.

I very early in the Sophomore year gave up all thoughts of obtaining high honors.

C. A. Bristed, English University, p. 6.

termine questions concerning honor or honorable conduct as affecting individuals or a community. Specifically—(a) One of a class of courts which formerly existed in Europe for regulating and settling matters relating to the laws of honor, and for correcting encroachments in matters of coat-armour, precedence, etc. They were courts of chivalry. (b) In several European armies, a court composed of officers authorized to inquire into and punish all breaches of the principles of honor on the part of officers.—Debt of honor. See debt.—Honor bright! a protestation of or appeal to honor. [Colloq.]—Honors are easy. See easy.—Honors of war, formal military manifestations of respect; specifically, the privileges granted to a capitulating force at the discretion of a victorious commander. Permission to march out with all the honors of war is the right accorded to a surrendering garrison of marching out of their camp or intrenchments with all their arms, and with colors flying, drums beating, etc.—Last honor, usually last honors, a ceremony of respect paid to the dead; funeral rites; obsequies.

As soon as the prince Faciliás had paid the last honors to his father, he set about composing those disorders which had so long distracted the kingdom by reason of the difference of religion. Bruce, Source of the Nile, II. 401.

Laws of honor, the laws or established rules of honorable conduct; especially, the regulations concerning the occasions for fighting duels and the methods of conducting them in an honorable manner. Such laws were formerly generally recognized and rigidly enforced by public opinion.—Maid of honor, a lady in the service of a queen, whose duty it is to attend the queen when she appears in public.

Poor soul! I had a maid of honour once;
She wept her true eyes blind for such a one,
A rogue of canzonets and serenades.

Tennyson, Princess, iv.

On or upon my honor, words accompanying a declaration, and pledging one's honor or reputation for the truth of it. The members of the British House of Lords, in their judicial capacity, give their verdict on their honor.

Look, the good man weeps!
He's honest, on mine honour.

Shak., Hen. VIII., v. 1.

York. Upon thine honour, is he prisoner?
Buck. Upon mine honour, he is prisoner.

Shak., 2 Hen. VI., v. 1.

Point of honor. (a) A scruple arising from sense of duty or delicacy of feeling, which determines the action of a man on a particular occasion; as, he hesitated on a point of honor. (b) Under the code or laws of honor, the obligation to demand or grant satisfaction for a wrong or an insult, especially by means of a duel.

The point of honor has been deem'd of use
To teach good manners and to curb abuse, Tis hard, indeed, if nothing will defend Mankind from quarrels but their fatal end.

Cowper, Conversation, 1. 163.

To do honor to. (a) To treat with special or marked respect; manifest approbation of; confer honor upon: as, to do honor to a man or to his actions. (b) To gain respect for by honorable or laudable action; do something that brings honor or credit to: as, to do honor to one's self, or to one's profession or country.—To make one's honorist, to make obeisance; do reverence.

They paced once about, in their ring, every pair making their honors, as they came before the state.

B. Jonson, Masque of Hymen.

Caroline arose from her seat, made her curtsy awkwardly enough, with the air of a boarding-school miss, her hands before her. My father let her make her honors, and go to the door. Richardson, Sir Charles Grandison, II. 190.

hoop¹ (hōp or hūp), n. [< ME. hoope, hope, a hoop, < AS. hōp*, not found in the same sense of 'hoop,' but what seems to be essentially the same word is found in comp., fen-hōp, mōr-hōp (poet.), a hollow or pool, or a mound or hummock, or more prob. a recess, in a fen or moor; hōp-gelmeſt (poet.), the dashing of the waves (against the shore of a bay?), deriv. hōpig (poet.), in hills and hollows (of the waves); also in compound place-names, as East-hōp, E. East-hope, Bethlīnghōp, etc. (see *hope*², 2); further in comp. hōp-pāda, in a gloss, i. e. a 'hoop-tunic,' or circular cloak (?); = OFries. hōp, a hoop, band, = North Fries. hop, a hoop, band, ring, = D. hoep (also dim. hoepel), a hoop, = Icel. hōp, a small landlocked bay or inlet (named appar. from its circular form), > E. *hope*³, a bay or inlet: see *hope*² and *hope*³. Root unknown.] 1. A circular band or flattened ring of wood, metal, or other material; especially, a band of wood or metal used to confine the staves of casks, tubs, etc., or for any similar purpose; also, that part of a finger-ring which surrounds the finger, as distinguished from the chaton.

A hoop of gold, a paltry ring
That she did give me. Shak., M. of V., v. 1.

The performance of leaping through barrels without heads, and through hoops, especially the latter, is an exploit of long standing. Strutt, Sports and Pastimes, p. 317.

2. A large ring of wood or iron for a child to trundle.

The boy . . .
Had tost his ball and flown his kite, and roll'd
His hoop to pleasure Edith.

Tennyson, Aylmer's Field.

3. A circular band of stiff material serving to expand the skirt of a woman's dress: often used, either in the singular or in the plural, for the skirt itself so expanded. The hoop or hoop-skirt was evolved from the farthingale of the sixteenth century. (See farthingale.) The time of its greatest extravagance was the middle of the eighteenth century, when the bell-shaped skirt was expanded to enormous dimensions by hoops. At a later time the hoop consisted of two separate structures, one over each hip, the two being held together by a girdle. The use of hoops continued with some intermissions till about 1820. About 1832 skirts began to be expanded again by the use of crinoline petticoats (see crinoline), for which were afterward substituted underskirts (called hoop-skirts) with a series of hoops, at first of ratan and whalebone and afterward of flat flexible steel, which at times were nearly as large as those of a century earlier. They went out of use again about 1870.

Th' important charge, the petticoat, . . .
Though stiff with hoops, and arm'd with ribs of whale.

Pope, R. of the L., II. 120.

But from the hoop's bewitching round,
Her very shoe has power to wound.

E. Moore, Spider and Bee, Fable x.

It may be noticed that by the end of 1787 hoops had almost entirely gone out of fashion.

Fortnightly Rev., N. S., XLIII. 291.

4. Something resembling a hoop; anything circular: technically applied in botany to the overlapping edge of one of the valves of the frustule of the Diatomaceæ.

Hast thou forgot
The foul witch Syccorax, who, with age and envy, Was grown into a hoop? Shak., Tempest, I. 2.

Each organism forms a small box, the silicious walls of which completely enclose a space; these walls in many, if not in all, species are formed by two distinct plates or valves, each possessing its own hoop, one of which embraces or slides over the other like the lid of a box. This hoop, connecting zone or belt, may be single, double, or of complex structure. Challenger Reports, II. 3.

5†. A certain quantity of drink, up to the first hoop on a quart pot (which was formerly bound with hoops like a barrel).

I believe hoopes in quart pots were invented that every man should take his hoope, and no more.

Nashe, Pierce Penilesse.

6†. An old English measure of capacity, variously estimated at from 1 to 4 pecks.

Half a hoop of corn.

Tullie, Siege of Carlisle, p. 22. (Halliwel.)

7. The casing inclosing a pair of millstones; also, a reinforcing band about one of the stones. — Provisory hoop, in cask-making, a device for straining up and holding the staves. It consists of a chain and double screws for tightening it. See cut in next column. — To set the cock on hoop. See cock!

Provisory Hoop.

hoop¹ (hōp or hūp), v. t. [< ME. hoopen; from the noun.] 1. To bind or fasten with a hoop or with hoops; provide with a hoop: as, to hoop a barrel or puncheon.

Good son, loke thy bagges be hoopid at the mothe a-bove,
The surere mayst thou put in thy wyne vnto thy behoue.

Babees Book (B. E. T. S.), p. 138.

2. To clasp; encircle; surround.

Off with these robes of peace and clemency,
And let us hoop our aged limbs with steel,
And study tortures for this tyranny!

Beau. and Fl. (7), Faithful Friends, v. 2.

I hoop the firmament, and make
This my embrace the zodiac. Cleaveland.

hoop² (hōp), v. and n. Same as whoop.
hoop^{3†} (hōp), n. [Also whoop, houpe, hoope; < F. huppe, OF. huppe, hupe = It. upupa, formerly also upegā, < L. upupa = Gr. εὔρυς, a hoopoe; prob. orig. imitative of the bird's cry; hence the variation of forms. Cf. OHG. wituhopfo, -hoffo, MHG. witehopfe, G. wiedehopf, > appar. MD. weedhoppe, wedehoppe (also simply weede, wede, and hoppe, D. hop), a hoopoe, lit. 'wood-hopper,' < OHG. witu, = AS. widu, wudu, E. wood, + OHG. hopfōn*, MHG. G. hopfen = AS. hoppian, E. *hop*¹; but the second element may have been suggested by the imitative name. Cf. Servian hupak, hupac, hoopoe; the general Slavic name is also imitative, in another form, O Bulg. vidoditi, vididiti, Bohem. dud, Pol. dudek, Russ. udodki, Little Russ. vdod, vdud, udod, odud, udul, etc. See hoopoe, the form now in use.] Same as hoopoe.

hooper¹ (hō'pēr or hūp'ēr), n. [< *hoop*¹, v., + -er.] One who hoops casks or tubs; a cooper.
hooper² (hō'pēr), n. [< *hoop*² + -er; its cry is said to resemble the syllable hoop.] The European whooping swan, Cygnus musicus; so called from its cry. It is one of several swans which have the windpipe peculiarly coiled in a cavity of the breast-bone, and the bill not tuberculate. The adult is snow-white, with black feet, and a black bill blotched with yellow.

hooper³ (hō'pēr), n. Same as hoopoe.

hooper's-hide, n. The game of blindman's-buff. Nares.

But Robbin finding him silly,
Most friendly took him aside,
The while that his wife with Willy
Was playing at hooper's hide.

The Winchester Wedding (old ballad).

hooping (hō'ping or hūp'ing), n. [Verbal n. of *hoop*¹, v.] 1. Hoops in general, or the materials used for hoops. — 2. The hoops used in building or strengthening any article, as the hoops shrunk on a built-up gun.

For the whole length of the breech-screw, hooping is of no avail, for only longitudinal strains are here developed. Michaelis, tr. of Monthaye's Krupp and De Bange, p. 77.

hooping-cough (hō'ping-kōf'), n. See whooping-cough.

hoop-iron (hōp'i'ern), n. Strap-iron or thin ribbon-iron from which hoops are made for baling cotton, securing packing-boxes, etc.

hoopkoop-plant (hōp'kōp-plant), n. [Etym. unknown.] A low, spreading leguminous plant, Lespedeza striata, originally from China or Japan, but introduced (about 1850) into the southern Atlantic States, where it is rapidly spreading in old fields and waste places. It is greedily eaten by cattle.

hoople (hō'pl), n. [Dim. of *hoop*¹, after D. hoepel, dim. of hoep.] A child's hoop, usually

hoop-lock (hōp'lok), n. A fastening formed by interlocking notches in the ends of a barrel-hoop.

hoop-net (hōp'net), n. A net the mouth of which is stretched upon a hoop, as a handle-net, dip-net, scoop-net, etc. A hoop-net with a rectangular or circular opening is often used to capture fish under the ice.

hoopoe, hoopoo (hō'pō, -pō), n. [The form hoopoe was doubtless orig. pron. like hoopoo, which, with hoopoop, first appears about 1667-78; an imitative var. or clipped reduplication of the earlier hoop, appar. after L. upupa: see *hoop*³.] A tenuirostral non-passerine bird of the family Upupidae. The best-known species is Upupa epops, the common hoopoe of Europe, a bird about 12 inches long, with a slender, sharp, decurved bill about 2½ inches long, and a large, thin, compressed, and semicircular crest, erectile at will, on the head. The general color is buff of some shade, varied with black and white on the wings and tail. The bird is insectivorous and migratory, and is widely diffused in Europe, Asia, and Africa. There are several other species of Upupa. The birds of the neighboring family Irrisoridae are known as wood-hoopoes. Also hooper.

Hoopoe (Upupa epops).

'Vannellus' (the lapwing) is a new-made name of the French 'vannneau': which bird, by a great mistake, hath been generally taken to be the upupa of the ancients, which is now by all acknowledged to be the hoopoe.

Ray, Dictionarium Trilingue, p. 22.

You know the holy birds who run up and down on the Prado at Seville among the ladies' pretty feet — eh? with hooked noses and cinnamon crests? Of course. Hoopoes — Upupa, as the classics have it.

Kingsley, Westward Ho, xxvi.

hoopoopt, n. Same as hoopoe. Charleton.

hoop-petticoat (hōp'pet'i-kōt), n. 1. Same as hoop-skirt.

Must we accept the costume of to-day, and carve, for example, a Venus in a hoop-petticoat?

Hawthorne, Marble Faun, xiv.

2. A plant, Narcissus Bulbocodium, a native of heaths in France, so called from the shape of its flowers. See narcissus.

The daffodil, the "peasant-eye," and the hoop-petticoat are all narcissuses, and bloom freely in-doors.

J. Habberton, Harper's Mag., LXXVIII. 367.

hoop-pine (hōp'pin), n. A large coniferous tree, Araucaria Cunninghamii, a native of eastern Australia, where it attains a height of 200 feet and a diameter of 6 feet. Also called the Moreton Bay pine.

hoop-pole (hōp'pōl), n. A smooth, straight shoot of green wood, usually a sapling of small diameter, for making hoops for casks. [U. S.]

hoop-ring, n. [< ME. hope-ring; < *hoop*¹ + -ring.] A finger-ring.

M.S. Ashmole, 302, fol. 56. (Halliwel.)

Hoop-rings and childrens whistles, and some forty or fifty dozen of gilt-spuns, that's all.

W. Cartwright, Lady Errant (1651).

hoop-shell (hōp'shell), n. A shell of the genus Trochus; a top-shell.

hoop-skirt (hōp'skért'), n. A petticoat stiffened and expanded by means of hoops of ratan, whalebone, or steel. Also hoop-petticoat.

The hoop-skirts now in vogue typify the swelling conceit, the empty pride and vanity, which, beginning with the upper circles, is mimicked and caricatured by all the orders of society, from the family of the millionaire down to that of the humble grocer and fruit-dealer.

W. Mathews, Getting on in the World, p. 315.

hoop-snake (hōp'snak), n. A snake fabled to take its tail in its mouth and roll along like a hoop; specifically, Abaster erythrogrammus, a harmless species of the family Colubridæ, abundant in the southern United States.

hooze (hōs, hōz), n. [A dial. var. of hoarse (ME. hose, etc.): see hoarse; prob. confused in part with hoast, haust, whoost, etc.] A disease incident to cattle, especially to calves, characterized by a husky cough, loss of appetite, dry muzzle, coat rough and staring, quickened respiration, the horns hot, but the ears, nose, and legs cold, and the bowels frequently constipated. It is caused by the filling of the bronchial tubes and air-passages with hair-like white worms, the eggs of which are found on the grass in damp pastures.

Hoosier (hō'zhēr), n. [A name of homely form, doubtless of some forgotten local origin. Various stories are told to account for it, but none are authenticated by evidence.] An inhabitant of the State of Indiana: a nickname: also used adjectively. [U. S.]

It has been in my mind since I was a Hoosier boy to do something toward describing life in the back-country districts of the Western States.

E. Eggleston, Hoosier Schoolmaster, p. 5.

hoot (hōt), v. [ME. hōuten, huten, hōten, prob. of Scand. origin, < OSw. huta, in the phrase hut ut en, cast out with contempt, as one would a dog, lit. 'hoot out one,' Sw. huta ut, take one up sharply, lit. 'hoot out.' Cf. MHG. hūzen, hūzen, call to the pursuit; imitative words, in so far as they rest upon the exclamatory syllables, Sw. hut, begone, Sc. hoot, hout, q. v. (cf. W. hwt, off, away, Ir. ut, out, pshaw, Gael. ut ut, interj. of dislike), D. hūt, Dan. hūj, ho, halloo. The reg. form repr. ME. hōuten would be hout (riming with shout, so reg. hop for hoop); but the imitation preserves the more sonorous sound.] I. intrans. 1. To cry out or shout in contempt.

And thow, Astrot, hot out and haue oute oure knaues, Coltyng and al hus kynne oure catel to saue. Piers Plowman (C), xxi. 289.

The people poynted at her for a murderher, yonge children howted at her. Nashe, Pierce Penilesse.

I am wretched!
Open'd, discover'd, lost to my wishes!
I shall be howted at.

Fletcher, Spanish Curate, iii. 4.

The agitators harangued, the mobs hooted. Dieracki.

2. To cry as some owls: distinguished from screech.

The clamorous owl, that nightly hoots and wonders
At our quaint spirits. Shak., M. N. D., ii. 3.

II. trans. To drive or pursue with cries or shouts uttered in contempt; utter contemptuous cries or shouts at.

Away, and let me shift; I shall be hooted else. Fletcher, Wildgoose Chase, iii. 1.

His play had not been hooted from the boards. Macaulay, Madame D'Arbly.

hoot (hōt), n. [Cf. hoot, v.] A cry or shout in contempt.

hop² (hop), n. [Cf. ME. hoppe ('hoppe, sede for beyre [var. berre], humulus, secundum extraneos'—Prompt. Parv., A. D. 1440—the earliest instance in E.), < MD. hoppe, D. hop = MLG. LG. hoppe = OHG. hopfo, MHG. hopfe, G. hopfen, the hop. The ML. hupa, F. houblon, houblon, Walloon hubillon, hop, OF. hoppe, houppes, beer, are of D. origin. The MD. hommel, Icel. humall, Sw. Dan. humle, > ML. humulus, humulus, NL. humulus, the hop, may be ult. connected with *hop*²; but evidence is lacking.] 1. A plant, Humulus Lupulus, of the natural order a, male flower; b, female flower; c, single fruit; d, embryo.

Male Flowering Branch (1) and Fruiting Branch (2) of Hop (Humulus Lupulus).

Urticaceae, with long twining stems and abundant 3- to 5-lobed leaves. The female flowers, which grow in strobiles or catkins, are used to impart a bitter flavor to malt liquors, and to preserve them from fermentation, their active properties depending on the presence of an aromatic and mildly narcotic resin, called lupulin, secreted by the scales and fruit. The hop-plant is a diocious perennial, indigenous in temperate Europe, Asia, and North America. It is trained upon poles, and requires to be cultivated with great care; a full crop is not produced till the fourth or fifth year after planting. The hops when ripe are picked by hand, dried in a kiln called an oast, and packed into bags or pockets. They can be kept several years by tight packing. In medicine hops are used as a tonic and soporific, in tincture and infusion, and in some cases in bulk.

A land of hops and poppy-mingled corn.
Tennyson, Alymer's Field.

There are makers of beer who substitute for the clean bitter of the hops some deleterious drug.
C. D. Warner, Backlog Studies, p. 141.

2. pl. The flowers of this plant, as used in brewing, medicine, etc.—3. Wood fit for hop-poles. Halliwel. [Prov. Eng.]

hop² (hop), v. i. pret. and pp. hopped, ppr. hopping. [Cf. *hop*², n.] I. trans. To treat with hops: as, to hop ale.

The worts [in operations of brewing beer] are then boiled and hopped in the copper.
S. Dowell, Taxes in England, IV. 140.

The beers are very strongly hopped.
Thausing, Beer (trans.), p. 229.

II. intrans. To pick or gather hops.

After that, I was a hopping, and made my 15s. regular at it, and a haymaking.
Mayhew, London Labour and London Poor, I. 104.

hop-back (hop'bak), n. The vessel beneath the copper which receives the infusion of malt and hops, and the perforated bottom of which strains off the hops from the unfermented beer.

hopbind[†] (hop'bind), n. [Cf. *hop*² + bind.] Same as hopbine.

It is . . . made felony without benefit of clergy, maliciously to cut any hop-binds growing in a plantation of hops.
Blackstone, Com., IV. xvii.

hop-clover (hop'klō'vēr), n. Same as hop-trefoil.

hop-cushion (hop'kūsh'ōn), n. Same as hop-pillow.

hop-dog (hop'dog), n. A tool used for drawing hop-poles out of the ground. [Prov. Eng.]

hop-drier (hop'dri'er), n. A heated room or inclosure fitted with trays, etc., for drying hops; a hop-kiln.

hope¹ (hōp), v. i. pret. and pp. hoped, ppr. hoping. [Cf. ME. hopen, hope, sometimes merely expect, think, guess, without implication of desire; < AS. hopian (pret. hopode), hope, look for (followed by prep. tō, to, or by a clause with that, that), = D. hopen, hoopen = MLG. LG. hopen, hopen = MHG. hoffen, G. hoffen = Icel. hopask, refl., = Sw. hoppas, refl., = Dan. haabe, hope. Root unknown; the L. cupere, desire, does not agree phonetically: see cupidity.] I. intrans. 1. To entertain or indulge an expectation of something desired.

But if we hope for that we see not, then do we with patience wait for it. Rom. viii. 25.

Are we to hope for more rewards or greatness,
Or any thing but death, now he is dead?
Fletcher, Valentinian, iv. 4.

2. To have confidence; trust with earnest expectation of good.

Why art thou cast down, O my soul? and why art thou disquieted within me? hope thou in God. Psa. xlii. 11.

And I can weep, can hope, and can depand, Feel wrath and pity, when I think on thee!
Cowper, Task, iii. 841.

Hope humbly then; with trembling pinions soar.
Pope, Essay on Man, I. 91.

To hope against hope, to hope without hopeful prospect or encouragement; hope in the absence of all the conditions which justify hope.

II. trans. 1. To desire with expectation; look forward to as desirable, with the expectation of obtaining: with a clause (with or without that), or, less commonly, a noun as object.

My father dead, my fortune lives for me;
And I do hope good days, and long, to see.
Shak., T. of the S., i. 2.

Now am I feeble grown; my end draws nigh;
I hope my end draws nigh.
Tennyson, St. Simeon Stylites.

[Hope is also loosely used as synonymous with desire, long for, or wish.]

2†. To expect; regard as likely to happen: not implying desire: with a clause as object.

There are many manners of thynkynges, whilke are beste to the I cane noghte say, bot I hope the whilke thou telis maste saour in and maste riste for the tyme it es beste for the. Hampole, Prose Treatises (E. E. T. S.), p. 36.

Oure manciple, I hope he will be deed.

Chaucer, Reeve's Tale, l. 109.

In his bosom he hid his hand

And said he hurt it in a brand.

"That-on," he said, "I have slake pine [pain]

That I hope my hand to tye [lose]."

Holy Rood (E. E. T. S.), p. 85.

3. To imagine; have an impression; think: with an effect of irony; as, I hope I know what I am talking about. [Colloq.]

Why, very well; I hope here be truths.

Shak., M. for M., ii. 1.

hope¹ (hōp), n. [ME. hope, hope, expectation, ground or object of hope, < AS. hōpa (also in comp. to-hōpa) = D. hoop = MHG. hōffe = Sw. hopp = Dan. haab, hope; from the verb.] 1. Expectation of something desired; desire accompanied by expectation.

Captain Swan . . . and his Men being now agreed, and they encouraged with the hope of gain, which works its way thro' all Difficulties, we set out from Cape Corrientes, March the 31st, 1686.

Dampier, Voyages, I. 280.

Hope is that pleasure in the mind which every one finds in himself, upon the thought of a profitable future enjoyment of a thing which is apt to delight him.

Locke, Human Understanding, II. xx. 9.

It was natural that the rage of their disappointment should be proportioned to the extravagance of their hopes.

Macaulay, Sir J. Mackintosh.

2. Confidence in a future event, or in the future disposition or conduct of some person; trust, especially a high or holy trust.

Who [Abraham] against hope believed in hope, that he might become the father of many nations. Rom. iv. 18.

We have receiv'd a comfortable hope

That all will speed well.

Beau. and Fl., Honest Man's Fortune, I. 1.

Just so much hope I have of thee
As on this dry staff fruit and flowers to see!

William Morris, Earthly Paradise, III. 387.

3. That which gives hope; one who or that which furnishes ground of expectation or promise of desired good; promise.

When their brave hops, bold Hector, march'd to field, Stood many Trojan mothers sharing joy.

Shak., Lucrece, l. 1480.

I was my parents' only hope,

They ne'er had and not but me.

Mary Hamilton (Child's Ballads, III. 330).

Then they [the nobles] enacted, that Edwi Brother of Edmund, a Prince of great hope, should be banish't the Realm.

Milton, Hist. Eng., vi.

4. The object of hope; the thing hoped for.

For we are saved by hope; but hope that is seen is not hope: for what a man seeth, why doth he yet hope for?

Rom. viii. 24.

Thy mother felt more than a mother's pain,

And yet brought forth less than a mother's hope.

Shak., 3 Hen. VI., v. 6.

5†. Expectation, without reference to desire; prognostication. [Rare.]

By how much better than my word I am,

By so much shall I falsify men's hopes.

Shak., 1 Hen. IV., i. 2.

Forlorn hope. See forlorn. = Syn. 3. Reliance, dependence.

Scott, Bride of Lammermoor, xii.

Hopea (hō'pē-ā), n. [NL., after John Hope, professor of botany in Edinburgh (1725-86).] A genus of dicotyledonous polypetalous plants, belonging to the natural order Dipterocarpaceae. It is characterized by a short calyx-tube of five parts, two of which are extended into wings, a 5-celled convolute corolla, 15 or 10 stamens, and a 3-celled ovary. They are resinous trees, with entire coriaceous leaves and flowers, often secured along the ramifications of the panicle. Ten species are known, natives of tropical Asia. H. odorata is an evergreen tree, 80 feet or more in height, a native of British Burma and the Andaman Islands. The wood is yellow or yellowish-brown, hard, and close-grained. It is the chief timber-tree of southern Tenasserim, being used for house-building, cart-wheels, etc. The tree yields a yellow resin, used by the natives, when mixed with beeswax and red ochre, to make a wax used to fasten their arrows and spear-heads.

hopeful (hōp'fūl), a. and n. [*hope*¹ + -ful.] 1. a. 1. Full of hope; having desire with expectation of its fulfilment.

If ever he have child, abortive be it, . . .

Whose ugly and unnatural aspect

May fright the hopeful mother at the view.

Shak., Rich. III., i. 2.

For the air of youth,

Hopeful and cheerful, in thy blood will reign

A melancholy damp of cold and dry,

To weigh thy spirits down. Milton, P. L., xi. 543.

2. Having qualities which excite hope; promising advantage or success: as, a hopeful prospect: often used ironically.

Horse could never passe;

Much lesse their chariots, after them: yet for the foot there was

Some hopeful service, which they wisht.

Chapman, Iliad, xii.

While they [the people] were under the sense of their present miseries, Samuel puts them into the most hopeful way for their deliverance.

Stillingfleet, Sermons, II. iv.

A republic in an over-civilized, highly centralized, bureaucratically governed country, with a religiously hollow, hasty, violent, excitable people, seems of all social experiments the least hopeful.

British Quarterly Rev., LXXXIII. 429.

Form'd of two mighty tribes, the Bores and Bored.

Byron, Don Juan, xlii. 95.

I . . . clash'd with Pagan hordes, and bore them down.

Tennyson, Holy Grail.

Golden Horde, a name given to the possessors of the khanate of Kiptchak, a Mongol realm in eastern Russia and western central Asia. This realm was founded in the thirteenth century and overthrown in 1480.

horde (hōrd), v. i.; pret. and pp. horded, ppr. hording. [< horde, n.] To live in hordes; huddle together like the members of a migratory tribe: usually followed by together. Byron.

hordeaceous (hōr-dē-ā'shi-us), a. [< L. hordeaceus, of or relating to barley, < hordeum, barley: see Hordeum.] Barley-like; resembling barley.

Hordeæ (hōr-dē-ē-ē), n. pl. [NL., < Hordeum + -æ.] A tribe of plants belonging to the natural order Gramineæ, and typified by the genus Hordeum. The spikelets are one- to many-flowered, sessile on opposite sides of a zigzag jointed rachis, which is excavated or channeled on the side of each joint, forming a spike; glumes frequently abortive or wanting. Also Hordeæ and Hordeineæ.

hordein, hordeine (hōr-dē-in), n. [< L. hordeum, barley, + -in², -ine².] A pulverulent substance left undissolved on treating barley-starch with acidulated water. It is not a simple body, but a mixture of starch-cellulose and a proteid.

Watts, Dict. of Chem.

hordeolum (hōr-dē-ō-lum), n.; pl. hordeola (-lā). [NL., neut., < LL. hordeolus, m., a sty

(so called as resembling in size or shape a grain of barley), dim. of L. hordeum, barley.] In pathol., a sty or small inflammatory tumor on the edge of the eyelid.

Hordeum (hōr-dē-um), n. [L., also ordeum, OL. fordeum, barley, = OHG. gerstā, MHG. G. gerste = D. gerst, barley; perhaps connected with L. horrens, bristle, Skt. √ harsh, bristle, said of the hair: see horrent and horrid.] A genus of plants belonging to the natural order Gramineæ, and the type of the tribe Hordeæ, characterized by having the spikelets 1-flowered, 3 at each joint, but the 2 lateral usually sterile. The glumes are 6 in number, forming a kind of involucre, side by side in front of the spikelets, slender and pointed with an awn or of the form of a bristle. The grain is ovoid-oblong or narrow, adherent to the palea. About 12 species are known, natives of boreal Europe, Africa, temperate Asia, and America, including H. sylvaticum, the wood-barley of Europe; H. pratense, the meadow-barley of Europe and North America; H. murinum, the mouse- or wall-barley of Europe; H. maritimum, the sea-barley or squirrel-tail grass of western Europe; and H. jubatum, the American squirrel-tail grass. The cultivated barley belongs here, but the exact origin of the several forms under cultivation is obscure. See barley.

hore¹, a. An obsolete spelling of hoar. Chaucer.

hore², n. An obsolete spelling of whore.

hore³, pron. See hel.

horecopi, n. [Early mod. E., < ME. horecoppe, horecop, < hore, whore, + cop (uncertain).] A bastard. Palsgrave.

For, syr, he seyde, hyt were not feyre
A horecop to be yowre heyre.

Sir Tryamour, l. 223.

horehound, n. See hoarhound.

horestrong, horestrangi, n. Same as harstrong.

Horia (hō'ri-ā), n. [NL., appar. after L. horia, oria, a small vessel, a fishing-smack. The dim., NL. Horiola (< L. horiola, a skiff, a fishing-boat), is applied to a genus of hemipters.] A genus of South American coleopterous insects, of the family Cantharidae, the members of which are finely colored and of comparatively large size.

Horiadæ (hō'ri-i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Horia + -idæ.] A family of heteromerous Coleoptera, named from the genus Horia. Westwood, 1839.

horizon (hō'ri-zōn), n. [Formerly with the accent on the first syllable (in ME. orizonte on the last), as from the F.; now pron. as if directly from the L.; = D. horizon = G. horizont = Dan. Sw. horisont, < F. horizon = Pr. orizon = Sp. Pg. horizonte = It. orizonte, < L. hori-zon (horizont-), < Gr. ὁρίζων (sc. κύκλος), the bounding circle, the horizon, ppr. of ὁρίζω, bound, limit, < ὅρος, a boundary, limit.] 1. The circle which at sea forms the apparent boundary between sea and sky, and on land would bound the sky were all terrestrial obstructions down to the sea-level removed. Called the apparent, sensible, or visible horizon, in distinction from the astronomical horizon (which see, below).

When the morning sun shall raise his car

Shak., 3 Hen. VI., iv. 7.

Hence—2. The line that bounds the view; the limit of vision.

Our horizon is never quite at our elbows.

Thoreau, Walden, p. 141.

3. Figuratively, the limit of intellectual perception, of experience, or of knowledge.

The history of one horizon of life is that its own completion but prepares the way for a higher one, furnishing the latter with conditions of a still further development.

E. D. Cope, Origin of the Fittest, p. 433.

4. In geol., a stratum or group of strata characterized by the presence of a particular fossil not found in the underlying or overlying beds, or of a peculiar assemblage of fossils. Such a bed or series of beds is often designated as the zone of the fossil or group of fossils in question, and such a distinctly marked division is sometimes called a horizon, as forming a convenient plane of reference for other groups of strata occurring above and below, and not so definitely marked by peculiar fossil contents.

Lepidodendra are especially characteristic trees of this horizon. Dawson, Geol. Hist. of Plants, App., p. 277.

5. In zool. and anat., a level or horizontal line or surface: as, the horizon of the teeth; the horizon of the diaphragm.—Artificial horizon, a contrivance for enabling an observer to determine the altitude of a star above the horizon when the horizon itself is not visible. It consists of a small hollow trough containing quicksilver or any other fluid the surface of which affords a reflected image of a celestial body. The angle subtended at the eye by the star and its image in a fluid being double the star's altitude, this angle, when measured and halved, gives the altitude of the star.—Astronomical horizon, the great circle of the celestial sphere midway between the zenith and nadir, its plane being perpendicular to gravity at any station.—Celestial horizon. Same as astronomi-

a, male flower; b, female flower; c, fruit.

greenish-white flowers in terminal cymes. The fruit is a 2-celled and 2-seeded samara, winged all around, bitter, and said to be used as a substitute for hops. Also called water-ash.

cal horizon.—Geographical horizon, a great circle of the terrestrial sphere, having any given place as its pole. The sensible horizon, or horizontal plane tangent to the surface of the earth at a given station, is sometimes distinguished from the rational horizon, or plane parallel to the sensible horizon passing through the center of the earth. —Horizon of an artificial globe, the broad horizontal ring in which the globe is fixed. On this are several concentric circles, which contain the months and days of the year, the corresponding signs and degrees of the ecliptic, and the thirty-two points of the compass. —On the same horizon, in geol., said of fossils or strata which appear to be of the same age. —Physical horizon, the circle of tangency with the terrestrial sphere, or geoid, of a cone having its vertex at the eye of the observer. —Rational or true horizon. Same as astronomical horizon. —Visible horizon. See def. 1.

horizon-glass (hō-rī'zon-glās), n. In astron., the small plane mirror which is firmly attached to the frame of a quadrant or sextant, and has one half silvered. In measuring an altitude of the sun the observer looks directly through its transparent half toward the horizon at the point directly under the sun. Formerly two horizon-glasses were often used, one the front glass of which was described, the back the back glass, so placed that the observer looked through it to the point of the horizon opposite to that under the sun; this glass had simply a narrow unsilvered strip across its middle.

horizontal (hor-i-zon'tal), a. and n. [= D. horizontalis = G. horizontalis = Dan. Sw. horizontal = F. Sp. horizontal = It. orizzontale, < ML. horizontalis*, < L. horizon, horizon: see horizon.] I. a. 1. Of or pertaining to the horizon.

As when the sun new-risen
Looks through the horizontal misty air,
Shorn of his beams. Milton, P. L., l. 595.

2. Parallel to the horizon; at right angles to the direction of gravity at any station; being on a level; not vertical nor inclined: as, a horizontal line or surface; a horizontal position. Specifically—(a) In mech., acting or working, or placed, wholly or with respect to its main parts, in a level plane: as, a horizontal drill; a horizontal boring-machine; a horizontal saw-mill and mortising-machine; a horizontal pump; a horizontal escapement; a horizontal steam-engine. (b) In zool., being, as the parts, organs, surfaces, marks, etc., of a bilaterally symmetrical animal, parallel to a plane supposed to extend from end to end and from side to side of the body: as, horizontal wings (those which, in repose, lie flat over the body, so as to be parallel to the supposed plane).

3. Measured or contained in a plane of the horizon: as, horizontal distance.—Horizontal bar, battery, cornice, distance, leaf, mill, parallax, etc. See the nouns.—Horizontal line. (a) In persp., the intersection of the horizontal and perspective planes; an imaginary line crossing a picture parallel to its base or bottom line, and at the assumed level of the eye of the observer. (b) In figured bass, a dash under the note indicating that the tones of the first figured chord are to be continued without regard to the tone of the bass.—Horizontal line of Camper, in craniom., the intersection of the horizontal plane of Camper with the median plane of the head.—Horizontal plane, a plane parallel to the horizon, or not inclined to it; in persp., a plane parallel to the horizon, passing through the eye and cutting the perspective plane at right angles.—Horizontal plane of Camper, in craniom., the plane passing through the center of the external auditory meatus on either side and the inferior nasal spine.—Horizontal projection, a projection made on a plane parallel to the horizon.—Horizontal range of a projectile, the distance at which it falls on or strikes a horizontal plane, whatever be the angle of elevation.—Horizontal root, steam-engine, etc. See the nouns.

II. n. In craniom., the line drawn from the lower edge of the orbital cavity to the middle of the ear-cavity.

horizontality (hor-i-zon-tal'i-ti), n. [< horizontal + -ity.] The state of being horizontal.

No vase nor statue breaks the dead horizontality of the parapet. The American, XIII, 57.

horizontalization (hor-i-zon'tal-i-zā'shon), n. [< horizontal + -ize + -ation.] In craniom., the act of placing the skull for craniometrical measurement so that the plane taken as the horizontal datum-plane shall be truly horizontal. Anthropologists are not entirely agreed on a horizontal datum-plane, but the alveolocaudal plane is usually preferred—that is, a plane passing through the alveolar point tangent to the condyles. When this plane is made horizontal the skull looks to the horizon. When the skull is fragmentary the horizontalization may become a difficult problem, and the detection of an unusual datum-plane may be rendered necessary.

horizontally (hor-i-zon'tal-i), adv. In a horizontal direction or position; in the direction of the horizon; on a level: as, a line stretched horizontally.

It is occasionally requisite that the object-end of the instrument be moved up and down as well as horizontally or equatorially. Paley, Nat. Theol., viii.

horkey (hōr'ki), n. Same as *hockey*².

horkey-load (hōr'ki-lōd), n. Same as hockey-load.

Hormaphis (hōr'mā-fis), n. [NL., < Gr. ὄρνις, a bird, chain, necklace, + NL. aphis.] A genus of plant-lice founded by Osten-Sacken in 1861, having the antennal joints deeply incised and well separated, and the first two oblique veins of the fore wings uniting in a fork. The spinous gall-louse, H. spinosa, forms on the stems of wych-hazel a gall, which is a deformation of the flower-bud.

Horminum (hōr-mī'nūm), n. [NL. (Linnaeus, 1737), < Gr. ὄρνις, a kind of sage.] A monotypic genus of plants belonging to the natural order Labiata and tribe Satureieae, the type of Endlicher's subtribe Hormineae, and of Lindley's tribe Horminidae. It is characterized by having the calyx 2-lipped; the corolla with incurved, ascending tube; the anthers linear, 1-celled, confluent; leaves mostly radical, dentate, the upper reduced to narrow bracts; whorls 6-flowered; flowers violet-purple. The single species, H. Pyrenaicum, is a native of the mountains of Europe. Bentham makes Horminum a section of the genus Salvia; Moench, a subgenus of Mentha; Tournefort, a synonym for the genus Salvia.

hormogone, hormogon (hōr-mō-gōn, -gon), n. Same as hormogonium.

hormogonium, n. Plural of hormogonium. hormogonium (hōr'mō-gō-nim'ūm), n.; pl. hormogonia (-ā). [NL., < Gr. ὄρνις, a cord, chain, + γόνιμος, productive: see gonium.] One of the common forms of gonimia of lichens, especially characteristic of the *Collema*ceae. It is small, moniliform, and contained in a syngonium.

hormogonium (hōr-mō-gō-ni-um), n.; pl. hormogonia (-ā). [NL., < Gr. ὄρνις, a cord, chain, + γόνιμος, offspring.] In bot., a special reproductive body in the nostocs, having the form of a chain of roundish cells, from which new cenobia are formed. Also hormogone, hormogon.

The cells intermediate between two heterocysts escape in the form of a small chain, called a hormogonium, and swim about with a spiral motion through the water. They at length become quiescent and begin to divide both transversely and longitudinally. Of the cells thus formed some become heterocysts, and in process of time a new Nostoc is formed. Farlow, Marine Algae, p. 12.

hormogonous (hōr-mō-gō-nūs), a. [As hormogonium + -ous.] Possessing or resembling a hormogonium.

Hormospermæ (hōr-mō-spér'mē-ē), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. ὄρνις, a cord, chain, + σπέρμα, a seed, + -æ.] One of the principal divisions of the *Flori*deae, or red and purple seaweeds, as proposed by Agardh (1851). It includes the orders Squamariaceae and Spheroococcoidae, and the suborder Cramiæ (also called Delesseriæ, from the genus Delesseria), characterized by having the spore-bearing filaments articulated in a moniliform manner, and superficial or radiating in the pericarp.

horn (hōrn), n. [< ME. horn, < AS. horn = OS. horn (in comp.) = OFries. horn = OD. horn, horen, D. horen = MLG. horn, LG. horn = OHG. MHG. G. horn = Icel. Sw. Dan. horn = Goth. haurn = L. cornu (> ult. E. *corn*², cornet, etc.) = W. Gael. and Ir. corn (the Old Celtic form is represented by the entry kárpov, trumpet, in Hesychius), a horn; with formative -n, akin to Gr. κέρας (kepar-), a horn (see cerato- and carat), with formative -i; of the same root as AS. heort, heort, E. hart, and L. cervus, deer: see hart and Cervus. See hornet.] 1. An excrescent growth upon the head in certain animals, serving as a weapon of offense or defense. See def. 3. The horns of cattle, sheep, and goats are familiar examples. Such horns, technically called cornua or hollow horns, are permanent or non-deciduous; they always grow upon the head, and are hollow, being formed upon a solid core of true bone. They are usually in one pair, right and left; sometimes in two pairs, and in some fossil animals even in three. There may also be but one, as in some rhinoceroses, or there may be two placed one behind the other, as in others. True horns are distinguished from antlers by being hollow, permanent, and unbranched (except in the pronghorn antelope). They occur usually in both sexes. See Cavicornia, cornu.

And I stood upon the sand of the sea, and saw a beast rise up out of the sea, having seven heads and ten horns, and upon his horns ten crowns. Rev. xiii. 1.

It is said, "God sends a curst cow short horns."

2. An antler of a deer. Antlers are not true horns, but are bony, solid, and deciduous, and are for the most part confined to the male sex. They are technically called cornua solida or cornua decidua (that is, solid or deciduous horns). See antler.

3. Hardened and thickened epidermis or cuticle, as that of which nails, claws, and hoofs consist, differing from hair or other cuticular structures chiefly in density and massiveness. The character of horn as a cuticular outgrowth or appendage is well illustrated in the pronghorn antelope, in which the transition from a mass of agglutinated hairs covering a bony core of the frontal bone to hard horny substance at the tip is very gradual and readily observed. The thickened skin of the human heel is horn, and similar special thickenings are called corns. Tortoise-shell is another kind of horn, as are also the hard covering of the beak and feet of birds, the scales of reptiles, etc. Horn in this sense is related to bone or cartilage only in that it belongs to the same general group of connective tissues.

Neatly secur'd from being soil'd or torn,
Beneath a pane of thin translucent horn,
A book. Couper, Tirocinium, l. 120.

4. Something made of horn, or like or likened to a horn in position, shape, use, or purpose.

The conquering Brute on Corineus brave
This horn of land bestow'd, and mark'd it all with his name.
Drayton, Polyolbion, l. 505.

We skirt the western horn of Sabioncello, and another turn leads us through the channel.

E. A. Freeman, Venice, p. 192.
The wood which grides and clangs
Its leafless ribs and iron horns.
Tennyson, In Memoriam, cvii.

Specifically—(a) A feeler; a tentacle; an antenna; an ovipositor; also, the tuft of feathers upon the head of sundry birds, resembling a horn; a plumicern, as that of various owls.

As the snail, whose tender horns being hit,
Shrinks backward in his shelly cave with pain.
Shak., Venus and Adonis, l. 1033.

(b) A wind-instrument more or less resembling a horn in shape and size, and originally made of horn; as, a hunting-horn; a tin horn. In the simpler forms the horn is used chiefly to give signals, producing single or slightly variable loud tones. The hunting-horn, however, was early elaborated and made capable of producing a variety of calls, fanfares, and simple tunes. Wood, ivory, and various metals have been used for making horns.

He's blown his horn save sharp and shrill;
Up start the deer on every hill.
Bothwell (Child's Ballads, l. 159).

With horns and trumpets now to madness swell,
Now sink in sorrows with a tolling bell.
Pope, Dunciad, li. 228.

Waked at dead of night, I heard a sound
As of a silver horn from o'er the hills Blown. Tennyson, Holy Grail.

(c) By extension, a musical wind-instrument of the trumpet class, developed from the hunting-horn (previously modified for use in orchestras under the name cornu di caccia), and distinctively called the French horn, having a slender tube of brass or silver, several feet long, gracefully curved upon itself, terminating in a flaring bell, and blown through a mouthpiece of conoidal bore. Its tones are harmonious, and of the natural tone of the tube, produced by slightly varying the method and pressure of the blowing. Its compass is about four octaves, the series of tones in the two upper octaves being diatonic and partially chromatic.

In addition to these primary or open tones, modified or closed tones are produced by inserting the hand into the bell, so as to alter the pitch of an open tone chromatically. The pitch of the fundamental tone, and thus of the whole series of open tones, is altered by detachable crooks, which increase the actual length of the tube. From eight to twelve such crooks are made, pitching the instrument in nearly all the chromatic keys between the second C below middle C and the second B_♭ below that. The key in which the instrument is to be set is indicated at the beginning of each piece; but the music is written in the key of C. The pitch of the tube is still further affected by the tuning-slide, which is one of the curves of the tube so arranged that it can be pushed in or out at will. Ventilators or valves are sometimes added to the tube to facilitate rapid passages. Horns are the most valuable orchestral instruments of their class. Their tone is mellow, pervasive, and blending, with a peculiar romantic quality. The French horn is sometimes used singly or as a solo instrument, but in orchestras it is nearly always combined in pairs or in quartets, and used both for melodic effects, especially in fanfares and similar figures, and for sustained chords as a harmonic basis for free instrumentation. (d) A drinking-vessel of the shape of a horn or made of a horn. See drinking-horn.

They attended the banquet and served the heroes with horns of mead and ale. Mason, Notes on Gray's Poems.
They sit with knife in meat and wine in horn.
Tennyson, Merlin and Vivien.
(e) A long projection, frequently of silver or gold, worn on the forehead by natives of some Asiatic countries. (f) One of the extremities (cusps) of the moon when waxing and waning, and hence of any crescent-shaped object.

1, coaching-horn; 2, French or orchestral horn; 3, flügelhorn, or keyed bugle; 4, post-horn; 5, hunting-horn.

I saw a dolphin hang i' the horns of the moon,
Shot from a wave.

Fletcher (and another), Sea Voyage, i. 1.

The angelic squadron bright

Turn'd fiery, sharpening in moonbeams horns

Ere ten moons had sharpen'd either horn. Dryden.

The horns, or extremities of the bow, were two large tufts of cocoa-nut-trees.

Cook, Voyages, I. i. 7.

(g) The horn of a cow or other animal, or, now, any similar case or flask, used for holding gunpowder; a powder-horn or powder-flask.

Each man . . . places a ball in the palm of his hand, pouring as much powder from his horn upon it as will cover it.

Audubon, Ornith. Biog., I. 293.

(h) pl. A head-dress worn during the first half of the fifteenth century, the general shape of which was that of a pair of horns spreading like those of an ox. These head-dresses consisted of stuffs embroidered and set with jewels, or of nets (compare crespine) by which the hair was entirely or almost entirely concealed, a veil covering the whole.

(i) A projecting part of a head-dress, especially of that of women in the fourteenth century. (j) Ecceles, either of the corners or angles made by the front and ends of an altar. In Christian churches, that at the left of the priest when facing the altar is the gospel horn; that at his right, the epistle horn.

Bind the sacrifice with cords, even unto the horns of the altar.

Ps. cxviii. 27.

(k) In the Bible, a symbol of strength, power, or glory.
All the horns of the wicked also will I cut off; but the horns of the righteous shall be exalted.

Ps. lxxv. 10.

And hath raised up an horn of salvation for us in the house of his servant David.

Luke I. 69.

(l) In railroad-cars, a part rigidly fastened to the coupler or draw-bar, by means of which the coupler and buffer-springs are connected. Car-Builders' Dict. (m) Either of two projections on a side-saddle, serving to support the right leg.
(n) The beak of an anvil. (o) A branch of a subdivided stream.

With sevenfold horns mysterious Nile Surrounds the skirts of Egypt's fruitful soil.

Dryden, tr. of Virgil's Georgics, iv. 409.

(p) Naut., one of the ends of the cross-trees. (q) One of the alternatives of a dilemma. See dilemma, 1. (r) The imaginary projection on the brow of a cuckold. [Low.] [This use, derived through Italian from Greek, is extremely frequent in the plays of Shakspeare and his contemporaries.]

If I have horns to make me mad, let the proverb go with me; I'll be horn mad.

Shak., M. W. of W., iii. 5.

(s) In bot., any process or appendage which is shaped somewhat like the horn of an animal, as the spur of the petals in Linaria, or the crest borne by the hoods in Asclepias.

5. A draught of strong liquor: as, to take a horn. See def. 4 (d). [Colloq.]

The chaplain gave us a pretty stiff horn of liquor apiece.

W. E. Burton, Waggoners.

6. In arch., the Ionic volute.—Alpine horn, a long trumpet used by the Swiss mountaineers for signaling and for musical effects.—Amalthea's horn, the cornucopia, or horn of plenty.

With fruits, and flowers from Amalthea's horn.

Milton, P. R., ii. 356.

At the horn, put out of the protection of the law; proclaimed an outlaw. Ribton-Turner, Vagrants and Vagrancy, p. 354, note. [Slang.]—Bass horn, a large deep horn, once used in military bands.—English horn, a tenor oboe. See oboe.—French horn, the orchestral horn. See def. 4 (c).—Horn for the thumb, a kind of horn thimble worn by pickpockets on the thumb to support the edge of the knife in cutting out purses.

I have your name, now I remember me, in my book of horners; horns for the thumb, you know how.

Middleton and Dekker, Roaring Girl, v. 1.

Horn of plenty, or cornucopia, in classical myth, the horn of the goat Amalthea by which the infant Zeus was suckled, broken off by him and endowed with the quality of becoming filled with whatever its possessor might wish for; hence, in representation, a goat's horn as a symbol of plenty or abundance in general.—Horn of plenty grass, an Oriental grass, Cornucopia cucullata.—In 2, horn, not at all: a humorous expression of doubt or denial;
as, he will do it—in a horn (that is, will not do it). Sometimes, in provincial English use, extended to in a horn when the devil is blind. [Colloq. or slang.]—Sax horn.
See saxhorn.—To blow the buck's horn. See buck.—
To come out at the little end of the horn, to come off ill from any encounter or experience; to come to grief: used especially of one who completely falls in a boastful or pretentious undertaking. [Colloq.]—To pull or draw one's horns, to express one's anger, or restrain one's pride: as, in allusion to the snail's habit of withdrawing its feelers when startled.—To put to the horn, in old Scots law, to denounce as a rebel; outlaw for not appearing in the court of summons. This was done by a messenger-at-arms, who proceeded to the cross at Edinburgh, and among other formalities gave three blasts with a horn, by which the person was understood to be proclaimed rebel to the king for contempt of his authority.—To take the bull by the horns. See bull.—Valve-horn, a musical horn with valves for altering the pitch of particular tones.

horn (hörn), v. t. [< horn, n.] 1. To furnish with horns.—2. To cause to wear "horns" as the mark of a cuckold; cuckold. [Low.]

Vol. I not repent me of my late disguise.

Mos. If you can horn him, sir, you need not.

B. Jonson, Volpone, ii. 2.

The moon embraces her shepherd;
And the queen of love her warrior;

While the first does horn

The stars of the morn,

And the second the heavenly farrier.

Tom o' Bedlam.

3. To give the shape of a horn to.—4. To treat to a charivari, or mock serenade of tin horns, etc. See horning, 2. [Local, U. S.]—5. To adjust (the frames of a ship) in process of construction so that they shall be exactly at right angles with the line of the keel.

hornage, n. [< horn + age, after the equiv.
F. cornage, < L. cornu (= E. horn) + -age.] A quantity of corn formerly given yearly to the lord of the manor for every ox worked in the plow on lands within his jurisdiction. Cot- grave, under droict.

horn-band (hörn'band), n. A band of trumpet-ers.—Russian horn-band, a band of musicians each one of whom plays upon a horn a single note only of the scale. The horns vary in length from 12 feet to 9 inches, according to the pitch of the note, and to play the chromatic scale through a compass of 3 octaves requires 37 players. This method of performing music was invented, with a suitable system of notation, by J. A. Marech, a Bohemian domiciled in Russia, who gave his first performance before the imperial court in 1755. His method has been preserved in Russia down to the present time.
It admits of the performance with precision of somewhat complicated music, including runs, trills, and other em-bellishments, but the artistic value of the result is necessarily small.

horn-bar (hörn'bär), n. The cross-bar of a carriage, or the gearing supporting the fore-spring stays.

hornbeak (hörn'bék), n. The garfish: same as horn-eel, 2.

hornbeam (hörn'bēm), n. A small tree belonging to the genus Carpinus, of the natural order Cupuliferae. The American hornbeam, also called blue beech, water-beech and ironwood, is C. Carolini- ana or Americana. It is a shrub or small tree, 10 to 20 feet high, with very heavy, hard, close-grained wood, which is sometimes used in making carpenters' tools, handles, etc. The European hornbeam, C. Betula, is also a small tree, much planted in England. The wood makes a fine elastic tip for a fishing-rod, and is also used for agricultural implements, mallets, coars of wheels, etc. Also called yoke-elm, harubeam, and horn-beech. See cut under Carpinus.

With thee, where Easna's horn-beam grove

Its foliage o'er me interwove,

Along the lonely path I've stray'd.

J. Scott, Ode to Leisure.

horn-beast (hörn'bēst), n. An animal with horns; a horned beast.

Here we have no temple but the wood, no assembly but horn-beasts.

Shak., As you Like it, iii. 3.

horn-beech (hörn'bēch), n. Same as hornbeam.

hornbill (hörn'bīl), n. A large non-passerine bird of the family Bucconidae: so called from Rhinoceros Hornbill (Buceros rhinoceros).

the horny casque, in some cases of enormous size, which surmounts the bill. The bill is itself very large, like that of a toucan, on which account the hornbills have been associated with the toucans; they must be classed, however, with the kingfishers and hoopoes, notwithstanding the slightness of their superficial resemblance to these birds. There are two groups of hornbills, the tree-hornbills and ground-hornbills. The latter, which constitute the genus Bucconus, have the casque quite hollow and in some cases open in front. One of the largest of the tree-hornbills is the rhinoceros hornbill, Buceros rhino- ceros, having a bill nearly a foot in length, and surmounted by a horn nearly as large. It inhabits Sumatra. The concave-casqued hornbill of Asia is B. bicornis. A Philippine species is B. hydrocorax. African hornbills are chiefly of the genera Tockus, as T. erythrorhynchus, and Bycanistes, as B. buccinator; the ground-hornbills are also exclusively African. All these singular birds are for the most part frugivorous, and some of them are known to have the curious habit of imprisoning the female in the hole in which she lays her eggs, by stopping up the entrance, leaving room only to pass in food to her during her confinement.

hornbill-cuckoo (hörn'bīl-kūk'ō), n. An ani.
See Crotophaga.

hornblende (hörn'blend), n. [< G. hornblende, < horn, = E. horn, + blende, > E. blende: see blende.] A common mineral, crystallizing in the monoclinic system with a prismatic angle of 124° 45'. Parallel to this, the fundamental prism, it has perfect cleavage. It occurs usually in massive forms, varying in structure from compact to columnar and fibrous, with the fibers parallel or curved, and also, but less often, lamellar. In composition it varies widely, from the white tremolite, a silicate of calcium and magnesium, to the green actinolite, which contains also more or less iron, and to the dark-green, brown, and black varieties, pargasite and common hornblende, which contain alumina as well as lime, magnesia, and iron; manganese is also present in some varieties, and less commonly sodium and potassium. Asbestos, mountain-cork, and mountain-leather are included here, and nephrite or jade is a tough, compact variety. Hornblende is a constituent of many crystalline rocks, as syenite, diorite, hornblende schist, some kinds of trachyte, andesite, etc. The name amphibole is often used as the general term to include all the varieties.
The hornblende or amphibole group of minerals includes also the related orthorhombic species anorthophyllite, and the monoclinic arfvedsonite, crocidolite, glaucophane, etc.
In geology, hornblende or hornblende is often prefixed to names of rocks to indicate the accidental presence in greater or less quantity of that mineral, in addition to the other ingredients which the rock usually contains. Horn-blende is a frequent result of the metamorphism of other minerals, especially of augite.—Hornblende andesite.
See andesite.—Hornblende basalt, a very basic rock of holocrystalline texture, somewhat porphyritic, containing a comparatively small amount of feldspar and scattered crystals of hornblende. It is a characteristic rock of the Rhöngebirge in Bavaria, etc.—Hornblende gabbro, a variety of gabbro in which the diallage is more or less replaced by hornblende.—Hornblende rock, a rock consisting chiefly of black or dark-green hornblende, but often interlamated with feldspar, quartz, or mica. Also called amphibolite. The same rock when it has a schistose character is called hornblende slate or hornblende schist.— Labrador hornblende. See hypersthene.

hornblende (hörn-blēn'dik), a. [< hornblende +
-ic.] Containing hornblende; resembling horn-blende.—Hornblende granite. Same as hornblende granite. See granite, 1.

horn-blower (hörn'blō'ēr), n. [*< ME. horn- blower, earlier hornblawere, < AS. hornblāwære, < horn, horn, + blāw- ere, blower.] One who blows a horn; a trumpeter.

The Horn-blower [at Ripon] winds a horn every morning at nine o'clock, before the mayor's door and at the town cross.

Municip. Corp. Reports, 1835, p. 1710.

hornbook (hörn'būk), n. 1. A leaf or page, usually one containing the alphabet, the nine digits, and the Lord's Prayer, covered with transparent horn and fixed in a frame with a handle: formerly used in teaching children to read.

He teaches boys the horn-book. Shak., L. L. L., v. 1.

To Master John the English Maid
A Horn-book gives of Ginger-bread;
And that the Child may learn the better,
As he can name, he eats the Letter.

Prior, Alma, ii.

Hence—2. A book containing the first principles of any science or branch of knowledge;
a primer.

horn-bug (hörn'bug), n. A very common North American beetle, Passalus cornutus, of the family Lucanidae, of large size, elongate form, and shining black color with pitch-black legs, the elytra sulcate with regularly impressed lines of punctures, and the head armed with a stout curved horn. Its whitish larva, found in decaying of larva, showing legs; e, metathoracic leg of larva.

Horn-bug (Passalus cornutus), natural size.

stumps and logs, has the third pair of legs rudimentary, but the two anterior pairs are well developed. Riley, 4th Mo. Ent. Rep., p. 139.

horn-card (hörn'kär'd), n. A transparent plate of horn graduated for use on charts, either as a protractor or for meteorological purposes, to represent the direction of the wind in a cyclone.
Smyth.

horn-coot (hörn'kōt), n. The long-eared owl, horn-core (hörn'kôr), n. The core of a horn; a projection or process of the frontal bone on which the corneous substance of a horn is supported and molded. It is true bone, of which the horny substance forms only a sheath.
Asio otus. [Local, Eng.]

The horns of the Bovidae consist of permanent, conical, usually curved, bony processes, into which air-cells continued from the frontal sinuses often extend, called horn-cores, ensheathed in a case of true horn.

W. H. Flower, Encyc. Brit., XV. 431.

horn-cuirass (hörn'kwê-ras'), n. A coat of fence made of scales of horn stitched to a garment of leather or stuff. See scale-armor.

horn-distemper (hörn'dis-tem'për), n. A disease of cattle affecting the internal substance or core of the horn.

horn-drum (hörn'drum), n. A wheel having curved partitions which separate it into sections, used for raising water. E. H. Knight.

horned (hörn'd), a. [ME. horned (with restored vowel), < AS. hyrned (with mutated vowel) (= OHG. gi-hurnet, MHG. ge-hürnet, G. ge-hörnt = Dan. hornet; = L. cornutus, > E. cornute, q. v.); as horn + -ed.] Furnished with a horn or horns, or something resembling a horn in its nature, use, position, or appearance: as, horned cattle; a horned lizard; the horned moon.

In that Desert ben many wylde men, that ben hidouse to loken on: for thei ben horned.

Mandeville, Travels, p. 274.

O, that I were
Upon the hill of Basan, to outtroar
The horned herd! Shak., A. and C., iii. 11.

The dim and horned moon hung low. Shelley, Alastor.

Specifically—(a) In ornith., having feathers on the head projecting like horns: as, the horned owl; a horned grebe. (b) In entom., having one or more large horn-like projections. See cut under horn-bug. (c) Mitered. Hallwells. (d) In her., having horns: an epithet used when their tincture is different from that of the rest of the creature.—Horned beetle, frog, grebe, hog, horse, lark, owl, pheasant, poppy, pout, ray, screamer, etc. See the nouns.—Horned syllogism. See sylogism and dilemma. 1.—Horned road, river, etc. See the nouns.—Horned wavey, in her. See wavey.

hornedness (hörn'dnes or hör'ned-nēs), n. The state of being horned.

The antient Druids had their superstitious Rites at the Changes of the Moon. The Hornedness of the New Moon is still faintly considered by the vulgar as an Omen with Regard to the Weather.

Bourne's Pop. Antiq. (1777), p. 380.

horn-eel (hörn'el), n. 1. The larger sand-lance. [Prov. Eng.].—2. The garfish, Belone vulgaris: so called from its elongated body and produced jaws. [Prov. Irish.] hornel (hörn'nel), n. [Reduced form of horn-eel.] The horn-eel. [Prov. Eng.] hornent (hörn'nen), a. [ME. hornen (with restored vowel), < AS. hyrnen (= OHG. hurnin, MHG. hürnen, hornin, G. hörnern), of horn, < horn, horn: see horn and -en.] Of horn.

In voics of the hornene trumpet.

Wyclif, Ps. xvii. 6 (Oxf.).

horner (hörn'ner), n. [ME. hornere, hornare (= MD. MLG. horener), a trumpeter; < horn + -er.] 1. One who blows a horn; a horn-player; a trumpeter.—2. One who works or deals in horn.

Even the horns of cattle are prohibited to be exported; and the two insignificant trades of the horner and comb-maker enjoy, in this respect, a monopoly against the graziers. Adam Smith, Wealth of Nations, iv. 8.

3†. One who horns or cuckold. [Low.].—4. In old Scots law, one who had been put to the horn, or publicly denounced and proscribed; an outlaw. [Rare or obsolete in all uses.] horneress, n. A female horn-maker. Palsgrave.

Horner's method of approximation. See approximation.

Horner's muscle. See muscle.

hornet (hörn'net), n. [*ME. hornet (with restored vowel); not found, < AS. hyrnet, hyrnete, hyrnette, hyrnetu (with mutated vowel), earliest instance hurnitu (in a gloss, "crabro, waefis [wasp] vel hurnitu"), = MLG. hornite, hornetse = OHG. hornuz, hornaz, MHG. hornuz, horniz, G. horniss; G. dial. dim. hornissel = MD. hornsel, horsel, hursel (Kilian), D. horsel, a hornet; appar. < AS. OHG., etc., horn, with the same formative that appears in another deriv. from the same ult. root, namely, AS. heor-ot, heor-t, E. hart = OHG. hiruz, G. hirsch (see hart and horn), the ref. being to the hornet's horns or antennæ, or to the buzzing sound it makes; cf. MLG. horener, a hornet, also a trumpeter, 'horner', OLG. "horn-becon, crabrones," hornets, lit. 'horn-bearers', i. e. (perhaps) 'trumpeters,' = AS. horn-bora, tr. L. cornicen, a trumpet.

peter. The connection with horn is further shown by OFries. horene-bie, a hornet (Kilian), lit. a 'horn-bee,' horen-toren, a wasp (Kilian), LG. hornke, a hornet; cf. hornken, a little horn; cf. G. dial. hornch, and E. dial. hornicle, a hornet. But this connection may have originated in popular etymology; and the word may be really cognate with L. crabro (for crasro* (f); cf. L. tenebræ as related to Skt. tamisra: see dim), a hornet, and with the Slavic, etc., forms: OBulg. sršsha, a wasp, sršheni, a hornet, = Bohem. srch, srshen, srsha = Pol. szerszeń = Russ. shershe, etc., a hornet; OFruss. sirshits, hornet, = Lith. shirshits, shirshu, a wasp; cf. Bohem. srsheti, buzz. Observe that wasp also has cognate forms in L., Slav., Lith., etc.] 1. An insect of the wasp family, of the genus Vespa, much larger and stronger than wasps of other species, and capable of inflicting a more severe and painful sting. Hornets congregate in a cellular nest formed of a substance resembling coarse paper, elaborated from leaves and particles of wood. The nest is sometimes pendent, and sometimes placed in a hollow tree. The European hornet, V. crabro, and the American hornet, or yellow-jacket, V. maculata, are similar in character and habit. The name is often used for any large or formidable wasp, especially one whose sting is exceptionally painful.

American Hornet (Vespa maculata), natural size.

He's like a hornet now, he hums and buzzes

Nothing but blood and horror.

Fletcher, Double Marriage, iv. 4.

Who seem a swarm of Hornets buzzing out Among their Foes, and humming round about,
To spit their spite against their Enemies,
With poisonous Darts, in noses, brows, and eyes.
Sylvester, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, ii. The Decay.

2. Figuratively, a person who annoys by frequent and persistent petty attacks.

More than one sultan, hoping to rid themselves of the annoyance, fitted out expeditions against the island with the design of crushing the hornets in their nest. Prescott.

To bring a nest of hornets about one's ears, to stir up enemies against one's self; bring upon one's self a swarm of troubles or vexations.

hornet-clearwing (hörn'net-kler'wing), n. A hornet-moth, as Sesia apiformis or S. bembeciformis.

hornet-fly (hörn'net-flî), n. A dipterous insect of the family Asilidae; a robber-fly.

hornet-moth (hörn'net-môth), n. A moth of the family Sesiidae and genus Sesia or Ageria: as, the lunar hornet-moth, Sesia bembeciformis.

horn-finch (hörn'finch), n. The stormy petrel, Procellaria pelagica. [Local, Eng.] horn-fish (hörn'fish), n. [ME. (not found), < AS. hornfisc (= Icel. hornfiskr = Sw. Dan. hornfisk), garfish, < horn, horn, + fisc, fish.] 1. The garfish, Belone vulgaris: so called in allusion to the projecting jaws. [Prov. Eng.].—2. A species of Syngnathidae; a pipe-fish: so named in reference to the texture of the exoskeleton.

3. The sand-pike or sauger, Stizostedion canadense, a percoid fish: so named in allusion to its color.

hornfoot (hörn'füt), a. Having a hoof; hoofed. Hakewill.

horn-footed (hörn'füt'ed), a. [ME. not found; AS. horn-fôted, horn-footed.] Hoofed. [Rare.]

Jingle of bits,
Shouts, arrows, tramp of the hornfooted horse
That grind the glebe to powder! Tennyson, Tiresias.

hornful (hörn'fûl), n. [ME. not found, < AS. hornful, a horn holds: said of a drinking-cup or powder-flask, especially one made of horn. See horn, 4 (d) and (g).

horngeld (hörn'geld), n. Same as cornage.

Hornie, n. See Horny.

hornify (hörn'ni-fi), v. t.; pret. and pp. hornified, ppr. hornifying. [horn + -ify: see -fy.] 1. To make horny or of the consistence of horn.

A wrought-iron stalk is partly encased in a tube of vulcanite, or hornified india-rubber.
Dredge's Electric Illumination, I, App., p. lxxxii.

2†. To cuckold. [Low.]

This versifying my wife has hornified me.

Bean, and Fl., Four Plays in One.

horning (hörn'ning), n. [Verbal n. of horn, v.] 1. The appearance of the crescent moon.

They account . . . from the horning [of the moon], which is the cause why they set up in their steeples a crescent.
J. Gregory, Posthuma, p. 168.

2. A mock serenade with tin horns and other discordant instruments, performed either in humorous congratulation, as of a newly married couple, or as a manifestation of public disapproval, as of some obnoxious person. [Local, U. S.]

A few moments after the ceremony a gun was heard outside—the signal for the horning, without which in that region no wedding would be thought complete.

Examiner and Chronicle.

3. Public proclamation by the blowing of a horn; specifically, same as letters of horning.

[Scotch.]—Letters of horning, in Scots law, a process issued under the signet, after a debt has been judicially established, directing a messenger to charge the debtor to pay within a specified time, under pain of being declared rebel, with a warrant also to seize movables, etc. See caption.

hornish (hörn'nish), a. [horn + -ish.] Somewhat like horn; horny.

Temperance, as if it were of a hornish composure, is too hard for the flesh. Sir M. Sandys, Essays (1634), p. 21.

hornist (hörn'nist), n. [horn + -ist.] A horn-player.

hornito (hörn-nē'tō), n. [Sp., dim. of horno, an oven, kiln, furnace: see horno.] In geol., a low oven-shaped mound, common in the volcanic districts of South America, usually emitting from its sides and summit hot smoke and other vapors. Hornitos are only from 5 to 10 feet high, and according to Humboldt are not active cones, but mere intumescences on the fields and sides of the larger volcanoes. Also called horno.

In every direction [in the lava desert in Iceland] there are innumerable hornitos, seemingly formed originally of a variety of strands of the fiery ooze twisted into all sorts of fantastic shapes, the outer surface suggestive of a tangle of intertwisted snakes of inordinate thickness.

Nature, XXX. 564.

hornkecket, n. The garfish, Belone vulgaris. Palsgrave.

horn-lead (hörn'led), n. Lead chlorid: so called by the old chemists because it assumes a horny appearance in fusing. See phosgenite.

hornless (hörn'les), a. [horn + -less.] Having no horns.

The cattle of the highlands of Scotland are exceedingly small, and many of them, males as well as females, are hornless. Pennant, Brit. Zool., The Ox.

Heaps of ruin, hornless unicorns . . .
And shatter'd talbots, which had left the stones Raw that they fell from. Tennyson, Holy Grail.

hornlessness (hörn'les-nēs), n. The state of being destitute of horns.

Herodotus's opinion as to the cause of hornlessness has been accepted by many writers down to modern times. Amer. Naturalist, XXI. 897.

hornlet (hörn'let), n. [horn + -let.] A little horn or projection.

Wings . . . embracing the keel and the hornlets of the awning. Sir W. Jones, Select Indian Plants, No. 60.

horn-machine (hörn'ma-shên'), n. A machine for sewing on shoe-soles: so called because the shoe is placed on a horn.

horn-mad (hörn'mad), a. Mad with rage at having been made a cuckold. See horn, 4 (r). Keep him from women, he thinks 't'as lost his mistress; And talk of no silk stuffs, 'twill ruin him horn-mad.

Fletcher, Pilgrim, iii. 7.

horn-madness (hörn'mad'nes), n. The state of being horn-mad; raving madness.

Somebody courts your wife, Count? Where and when? How and why? Mere hornmadness: have a care.

Browning, King and Book, II. 832.

horn-mail (hörn'mäl), n. Scale-armor consisting of plates of horn. See scale-armor. This armor has been used by Oriental nations, and was introduced by the Emperor Henry V. of Germany as the defensive dress of a body of his troops. Horn has been found a valuable adjunct to defensive armor on account of its glossy surface, from which weapons glance. Compare tilting-target.

horn-maker (hörn'mä'kér), n. 1. One who makes horns, especially drinking-cups so called.—2†. A maker of cuckolds. [Low.] horn-mercury (hörn'mér'kü-ri), n. Mercurous chlorid, or calomel: so called by the older chemists because when fused it assumes a horny appearance. See calomel. Also horn-quicksilver.

Virtue is no horn-maker; and my Rosalind is virtuous. Shak., As you like it, iv. 1.

horn-mullet (hörn'mul'et), n. The stone-roller or black sucker, Hypentelium or Catostomus nigricans. [Chesapeake Bay.] horno (hörn'nō), n. [Sp., an oven, kiln, furnace, < L. furnus, formus, an oven, furnace: see furnace.] Same as hornito.

horn-of-plenty (hörn'qv-plen'ti), n. A European plant, Pedia Cornuopie.

hornotone (hór'nō-tin), n. [L. hornotinus, of this year, < hornus, of this year (adv. horno, this year), perhaps contr. of hovernus*, < hic, abl. hoc, this (cf. hodie, this day, to-day), + ver, spring (for 'year'): see vernul.] In ornith., a bird of the year; a yearling.

horn-owl (hór'n'oul), n. See owl.

hornpie (hór'n'pi), n. The lapwing, Vanellus cristatus. [Norfolk and Suffolk, Eng.]

horn-pike (hór'n'pik), n. [< horn + pike; cf. horn-fish. The AS. horn-píca means 'horn-peak', the pinnacle of a temple.] The horn-fish or garfish, Belone vulgaris.

hornpipe (hór'n'pip), n. [< ME. hornpype, horn-pipe; < horn + pipe.] 1. A musical instrument formerly used in England and Wales, perhaps the precursor of the English horn.

To awake
The nimble horn-pipe, and the timbure,
And mix our songs and dances in the wood.
B. Jonson, Sad Shepherd, i. 2.

2. An English country-dance of varied and hilarious character, usually performed by one person, and very popular among sailors.

Wherever in a lonely grove
He set up his forlorn pipes,
The gouty oaks began to move,
And flounder into hornpipes.
Tennyson, Amphion.

3. Music for such a dance or in its style.

horn-pith (hór'n'pith), n. The soft porous bone that fills the entire cavity of a horn.

Vast quantities of dilute phosphoric acid are formed in glue factories, by treating with muriatic or sulphuric acid and water bones and horn-piths.

C. T. Davis, Leather, p. 349.

hornplant (hór'n'plant), n. A seaweed, Ecklonia buccinalis: probably so called from the leathery frond. Also called hornweed.

horn-plate (hór'n'plát), n. One of the guide-plates in the pedestal of a car-truck, serving to hold the axle-box, and permit it to move up and down under the changing tension of the springs; an axle-guard.

horn-player (hór'n'plá'ér), n. A performer upon the horn.

horn-pock, horn-pox (hór'n'pok, -poks), n. A light form of smallpox or of chicken-pox: a name loosely applied.

horn-poppy (hór'n'pop'í), n. Same as horned poppy (which see, under poppy).

horn-pout (hór'n'pout), n. Same as horned pout (which see, under pout).

You have pleasant memories of going after pond-lilies, of angling for horn pouts—that queer bat among the fishes.
Lowell, Among my Books, 1st ser., p. 241.

horn-pox, n. See horn-pock.

horn-press (hór'n'pres), n. A special form of stamping-machine for closing the side seams of tin cans and boxes.

horn-presser (hór'n'pres'ér), n. A horn-maker. The name refers to the practice of pressing horn softened by heat into shape by means of molds, etc.

horn-quicksilver (hór'n'kwik'sil-vér), n. Same as horn-mercury.

horn-shavings (hór'n'shā'vingz), n. pl. Scrapings or raspings of the antlers of deer.

horn-shoot (hór'n'shót), v. i. To incline or diverge: said of any stone or timber which should be parallel with the line of a wall. Halliwel, [North. Eng.]

horn-silver (hór'n'sil'vèr), n. Silver chlorid: so called because when fused it assumes a horny appearance. See cerargyrite.

hornsmán (hór'nz'mán), n.; pl. hornsmen (-men). [< horn's, poss. of horn, + -man.] The horned adder or plumed viper, Clotho cornuta.

horn-snake (hór'n'snāk), n. The wampum-snake, Farancia abacura. See Farancia. [Local, U. S.]

All in the same instant a blaze of lightning discovered the maimed form and black and red markings of a "bastard hornsnake." G. W. Cable, The Century, XXXV. 733.

hornstone (hór'n'stón), n. A very compact siliceous rock, differing but little from flint. It is usually of a dark color, and occurs in nodular masses and bands. The term is rarely used, and no distinct line of division can be drawn between flint, hornstone, and chert. Hornstone is used in pottery-manufacture to make the grinding-blocks of flint-mills.

horn-swivel (hór'n'swiv'l), n. A hook-swivel made of horn.

horn-tail (hór'n'tāl), n. A terebrant hymenopterous insect of the family Uroceridae; a tailed wasp: so called from the prominent horn at the end of the abdomen of the male. It is related to the saw-fly. See Sirex and Urocerus.

horn-thumb (hór'n'thum), n. 1. A shield or thimble of horn for the thumb, used by pick-pockets as a protection in cutting out purses.

I mean a child of the horn-thumb, a babe of booty, boy, a cutpurse.
B. Jonson, Bartholomew Fair, ii. 1.

I cut this from a new-married wife.
By the help of a horn-thumb and a knife.
Greene and Lodge, Looking Glass for Lond. and Eng.

Hence—2. A pickpocket.

horn-tip (hór'n'tip), n. A button or knob placed on the end of the horn of an animal, as a guard or for ornament.

hornweed (hór'n'wèd), n. Same as hornplant.

Pope, Dunciad, iv. 317.

*horse*¹ (hòrs), n. [< ME. hors (pl. hors and horses), < AS. hors (pl. hors) = OS. hors, hros (hross-) = OFries. hros, hars = D. ros = OHG. hros, ros, MHG. ros (ross-), G. ross (> It. rozza = Pr. rossa = F. rosse, a jade) = Icel. hross, hors = Sw. Dan. dial. hors, a horse. Root uncertain; some connect the word with AS. horsc = MHG. rosch, swift, referring both to a root shown in L. currere (for cursere*), run: see current.] The Indo-Eur. word for 'horse' is that represented by Skt. asva = Gr. ἵππος = L. equus = AS. coh, etc.; see Equus. The ordinary Teut. terms outside of E. are D. paard, G. pferd (see palfrey); Sw. häst, Dan. hest (see henchman); the Rom. words are F. cheval, Sp. caballo, etc. (see cheval, capel, cavalry, etc.).

1. A solidungulate perissodactyl mammal of the family Equidae and genus Equus; E. caballus. It has a flowing mane and tail, comparatively small erect ears, comparatively large rounded hoofs, shapely head, arched neck, a callosity on the inner side of the hind leg below the hock, in addition to one on the fore leg above the so-called "knee," and a peculiar voice called a "neigh." These are the principal distinctive characters of the existing horses, of whatever variety, in comparison with the asses and zebras, which are commonly placed in the same genus (Equus). The horse has no distinctive coloration, but is never conspicuously striped in any regular pattern, and seldom shows even the dorsal and shoulder stripe characteristic of the ass, though there is often an indication of this marking in horses which have reverted to a feral state and tend to assume a dun color. The horse is now known only as a domesticated and artificially bred animal, though in both North and South America, in Australia, and in some parts of Asia the descendants of domesticated ancestors run wild in troops. The native country of the horse and the period of its subjection to man are unknown. Animals congeneric with the present horse, if not conspecific, have left their remains with those of the mammoth and other extinct animals in the bone-caves of both the old and new worlds, but the genus Equus appears not to have been fully established before the close of the Pliocene. The evolution of the modern forms has been traced back through the whole Tertiary period, by the discovery of such genera as Hipparion and Pliohippus of the Pliocene, Anchitherium, Miohippus, and Mesotherium of the Miocene, and Orohippus and Solihippus of the Eocene. In the course of this evolutionary series is observed a very gradual and unbroken geologic pedigree, going back to a small animal, not larger than a fox, with several separate toes on each foot. The size has steadily increased, and other progressive modifications, especially of the limbs, have resulted in the existing horse in all its numberless artificial breeds, races, and strains, combining in various degrees the qualities of size, strength, speed, and bottom. Two breeds—namely, the large, powerful, black breed of Flanders, and the Arabian—have contributed more than all others to develop the present varieties. The former laid the foundation of size, strength, and vigor for draft-horses and for those formerly used in war; while, when mailed armor was laid aside, and the horse began to be used for the chase, the latter conferred the speed and endurance which distinguish the hunter. The ladies' palfrey is largely derived from the Spanish genet, a small, beautiful, fleet variety of the Moorish barb. The race-horse has less of Flemish and more of Arabian blood. Other leading varieties are the Suffolk Punch and Clydesdale, both chiefly of Flemish blood, and best for draft and agriculture; and several varieties of ponies, as Galloway, Shetland, etc. Carriage, riding, and other horses combine the above breeds in varying degrees, as speed, endurance, strength, or size, etc., may be required. Horses are said to have "blood" or "breeding" in proportion as they have a greater or less strain of Arab blood. The wild horse of Tatar is called a tarpan, that of northern Africa a koomrah, and that of America a mustang, the last being descended from imported Spanish parents. The male of the horse is a stallion; when gelded, a gelding; the female is a mare; the young, a foal.—If a male, a colt, if a female, a filly. The colt and filly become "of age" when the "corner-nippers" (outer incisors) attain functional development. The age of the horse may be determined by the marks on the front teeth, which change with the wearing down of the crowns by use. When the mark disappears, as it generally does in the eighth or ninth year, the horse is "aged." The period of gestation is eleven months, and foals are generally dropped in the spring. Horses vary greatly in size, some standing more than twice as high as others. Very small horses are called ponties, as those bred in Shetland.

A noon he made twyne of his sonnes for to make hem redy and sette hem on two swifte horse. Merlin (E. E. T. S.), iii. 525.

Hast thou given the horse strength? hast thou clothed his neck with thunder? Job xxxix. 19.

The horse that guide the golden eye of heaven, And blow the morning from their nostrils. Marlowe.

In the earliest period, the Horse seems to have been the favourite animal for sacrifice; there is no doubt that before the introduction of Christianity its flesh was universally eaten. Grimm, Teut. Mythol. (trans.), I. 47.

2. pl. In zool., the horse family, or Equidae; the species of the genus Equus and related genera. These include all the existing asses of the restricted genus Asinus, and the quagga, dauw, and zebra, of the restricted genus Hippotigris, together with all the extinct forms of the Tertiary period which, however different from the modern horse, are connected closely by intermediate links. See Equidae.

3. The male of the horse kind, in distinction from the female or mare; a stallion or gelding.

Lo, the unback'd breeder, full of fear, Jealous of catching, swiftly doth forsake him, With her the horse, and left Adonis there. Shak., Venus and Adonis, I. 322.

No cow-boy ever rides anything but horses, because manes give great trouble where all the animals have to be herded together. T. Roosevelt, The Century, XXXV. 656.

4. A body of troops serving on horseback; cavalry: in this sense a collective noun, used also as a plural: as, a regiment of horse.

Our nineteen legions thou shalt hold by land, And our twelve thousand horse. Shak., A. and C., iii. 7.

The horse was the first that marched o'er, The foot soon followed after. The Boyne Water (Child's Ballads, VII. 254).

Back fly the scenes, and enter foot and horse; Pageants on pageants in long order drawn. Pope, Imit. of Horace, II. i. 315.

5. A frame, block, board, or the like, on which something is mounted or supported, or the use of which is in any way analogous to that of a horse. Compare etymology of *case*¹.

A kind of horse, as it is called with you, with two poles like those of chairmen, was the vehicle; on which is secured a sort of elbow-chair in which the traveller sits. Richardson, Sir Charles Grandison, IV. 299.

Specifically—(a) A vaulting block in a gymnasium. (b) A wooden frame on which soldiers are made to ride as a punishment: sometimes called a timber mare. (c) A saw-horse. (d) A clothes-horse. (e) A carriers' board, used in dressing hides. (f) In printing, a sloping board, with its support, placed over the bank close to the tympan of a hand-press, on which is laid the paper to be printed. (g) A support for the cables of a suspension-bridge. (h) A board on which the workman sits in grinding the bevels and edges of tools in their manufacture. Also horsing.

6. In mining, a mass of rock inclosed within a lode or vein, usually of the same material as the "country," or rock adjacent to the lode on each side.

The miner takes his chance of luck. He is generally content if he manages to pay his way along while the ores are poor; to lay by a little for the day when a horse or cut makes its appearance in the vein, confident that sooner or later he may strike a rich stretch of ore. Quoted in Mourry's Arizona and Sonora, p. 128.

7. In metal., same as beard, 7.—8. An implement or a device for some service suggesting or supposed to suggest that of a horse. Specifically—(a) A clamp for holding screws for filing. (b) A hook-shaped tool used in making raised or hammered work. (c) A wedge passed through a pin to tighten the contact of the pieces which the pin holds together.

Thanne is ther a large pin in maner of an extre that goth throw the hole that halt the tables of the clymates and the riet in the wombe of the moder thorw pin ther goth a litel wegge which that is cleped the hors, that streyneth alle thise parties to hepe. Chaucer, Astrolabe, i. 14.

(d) Naut.: (1) A foot-rope. (2) A jack-stay, on the forward or after side of a mast, on which a sail or yard is hoisted. (3) A traveler for the sheet-block of a fore-and-aft sail, consisting of a horizontal bar of wood or iron.

A horse . . . is used in sailing craft generally, for sheets to travel upon. Quattrough, Boat Sailer's Manual, p. 34.

(4) The iron bar between the posts of a file-rail to which the leading-blocks are fastened.

9. A translation or similar forbidden aid used by a pupil in the preparation of his lessons; a "pony"; a "trot"; a "crib"; so called as helping the pupil to get on faster. [School and college slang.]—10. Among British workmen, work charged for before it is executed.—11. A term of opprobrium. Compare *ass*¹, similarly used.

Your mayor (a very horse, and a traitor to our city) . . . must quarrel with the boys at their recreations. British Bellman, 1648 (Harl. Misc., VII. 635).

[Horse, as the first element of a compound, indicates a large or coarse thing of its kind: as, horse-chestnut, horse-crab, horse-mackerel, horse-play, etc.]—Barbary horse. Same as barb, 1.—Dark horse. (a) In horse-racing, a horse whose performances or capabilities are not generally known, or concerning whose chances of success in a pending race little or no information is to be had.

The first favourite was never heard of, the second favourite was never seen after the distance post, all the tent-owners were in the race, and a dark horse which had never been thought of rushed past the grand stand in sweeping triumph. Disraeli, Young Duke, ii. 5.

Hence—(b) Any competitor for or recipient of a prize, honours, or office concerning whom nothing is certain is known, or whose identity is at first concealed, as for reasons of strategy; one who is unexpectedly brought forward as a candidate, or for nomination in a convention: much used in American politics.

Every now and then a dark horse is heard of, who is supposed to have done wonders at some obscure small college. Cambridge Sketches.

Polk was what, in the political slang of to-day, is called "a dark horse"; but as to the test question, he could have been implicitly trusted. H. von Holst, John C. Calhoun, p. 244.

horse-flesh (hòrs'flesh), n. and a. 1. The flesh of a horse. Europeans have generally regarded horse-flesh as unfit for food; but hippophagy or horse-eating has always existed among some rude races, and has been advocated by many gastronomers in Europe. In Paris horse-flesh has long been surreptitiously dealt in as a cheap article of diet, and its sale, under strict official supervision, was authorized in 1866. The necessary use of it there during the siege of 1870-1 brought it into more general favor, which has been maintained. It is also eaten to some extent in other countries.

2. Horses collectively, with reference to driving, riding, or racing. [Colloq. or slang.]

He is a cogger of dice, a chanter of horse-flesh.

Thackeray, Legend of the Rhine.

3. A species of Bahama mahogany: probably so named from its color.

II. a. Of the color of horse-flesh; of a peculiar reddish-bronze color.—Horse-flesh mahogany. Same as sabiceu.—Horse-flesh ore, the mineral boronite: so called by Cornish miners because of its color on the fresh fracture.

Near the surface, especially on the Bruce location, a good deal of purple or horse-flesh ore was found.

Ure, Dict., IV. 253.

horse-flower (hòrs'flou'ér), n. [Cf. equiv. Flem. peerd-bloeme, horse-flower.] A species of cow-wheat, Melampyrum sylvaticum.

horsemaster (hòrs'mās'tēr), n. A manager of horses; a rider.

Of all classes in the kingdom, that from which the town volunteers spring is perhaps the least fitted by nature, habit, and training to yield us good horsemasters.
Fortnightly Rev., N. S., XLIII. 169.

horse-match (hòrs'mach), n. See horse-smatch.
horse-meal¹ (hòrs'mēl), n. Food without drink.
Davies.

Eating never hurt any one who washed down his victuals with a glass of good wine; horse-meals indeed are enough to choke human creatures.
C. Johnston, Chrysal, I. 220.

horse-meat¹ (hòrs'mēt), n. Food for horses; provender.

Who gives you your maintenance, I pray you? who allows you your horse-meat and man's meat?
B. Jonson, Epicoene, iii. 1.

horse-mill (hòrs'mil), n. A mill turned by a horse or horses.

horse-milliner¹ (hòrs'mil'i-nēr), n. One who supplies trappings and decorations for horses. [An affected term.]

The trammels of his palfrey pleased his sight,
For the horse-milliner his head with poses dight.
Chatterton, Rowley's Ballad of Charitie.

One comes in foreign trashery
Of tinkling chain and spur,
A walking haberdashery
Of feathers, lace, and fur;
In Rowley's antiquated phrase,
Horse-milliner of modern days.
Scott, Bridal of Triermain, ii.

horsemint (hòrs'mint), n. [*< ME. horsminte, < AS. horsminte (Lye—not authenticated) = Sw. horsmynte, Mentha arvensis (prob. taken from E.); < hors, horse, + minte, mint.] 1. A wild mint of Europe, Mentha sylvestris.—2. An American plant, Monarda punctata, common from New York southward.—Round-leaved horsemint, Mentha rotundifolia, a native of Europe, but now naturalized in the United States.—Sweet horsemint, Cunila Mariana, the common dittany.

horse-pistol (hòrs'pis'tol), n. A pistol of large caliber, formerly carried in holsters by dragoons and other horsemen.

horse-play (hòrs'plā), n. Coarse or rude play. Second Play. We have a play wherein we use a horse. Sim. Fellows, you use no horse-play in my house. Middleton, Mayor of Queensborough, v. 1.

The humour of the underplot constantly verges on horse-play, and is certainly neither delicate nor profound.

Nineteenth Century, XXIV. 541.

By personal raids upon the gallery when not acting, Mr. Phelps succeeded in stopping the horse-play and coarseness of audiences. Westminster Rev., CXXV. 581.

horse-plum (hòrs'plum), n. 1. A small red plum which is regarded as a variety of Prunus domestica. Also called horse-jag, horse-jug. [Eng.]—2. The wild plum, Prunus Americana. The fruit, when fully ripe, is sweet and edible, and the tree is frequently cultivated either for its fruit or as a stock on which to graft the varieties of the domestic plum. [U. S.]

horse-pond (hòrs'pond), n. A pond for watering horses.

horsepond (hòrs'pond), v. t. [< horse-pond, n.] To duck in a horse-pond. [Rare.]

If she had ordered me to be horseponded, I do protest to you I would not have demurred.

Miss Burney, Camilla, iii. 10.

horse-poppy (hòrs'pop'i), n. A European umbelliferous plant, Seseli Hippomarathrum.

horse-post (hòrs'pōst), n. A post to which horses are hitched; a hitching-post.

horse-power (hòrs'pou'ēr), n. 1. The power of a horse or its equivalent; the rate at which a horse works in drawing. Hence—2. A unit for the measurement of the rate at which a prime motor works. Several values have been assigned to this unit, but the one which prevails at the present time in England and America is Watts' horse-power, which is defined as 550 foot-pounds per second. This is 7460 megacrgs per second. The real power of a horse is about three quarters of a horse-power. Abbreviated H. P.

3. A machine for converting the weight or direct pull of a horse into power useful in moving machinery. Such machines are either treadmills or circular sweeps. The latter consist essentially of a long sweep to the end of which the horse is harnessed, a simple form of gearing for transmitting the motion of the sweep to a pulley, with generally an increase of velocity, and a belt or shafting for conveying the power of the machine to the work, as a mill, threshing-machine, press, pump, elevator, fire-engine, or other machine, to be driven.—Indicated horse-power, the work, expressed in horse-power, performed per minute by steam, air, or other gas upon the piston of an engine, in the computation of which the mean effective pressure per square inch of piston is taken from an indicator diagram. See indicator. Also called true, actual, real, or dynamic horse-power.—Nominal, calculated, or commercial horse-power, horse-power calculated from the area of the piston, sometimes not more than one tenth of the real horse-power. Though the commercial horse-power is arbitrarily called calculated horse-power, it is easy to calculate the true horse-power by the principles of thermodynamics when the volume or weight and pressure of the steam, air, or gas used for each piston-stroke and the number of strokes per minute are given.

horsepox (hòrs'pōks), n. A pustular disease of horses, which, communicated to cows, produces cowpox.

M. Blachez related the particulars of an outbreak of casual horse-pox among the she-asses used for giving suck to the inmates of a nursery. N. Y. Med. Jour., XL. 548.

horse-race (hòrs'rās), n. A race by horses; a match of horses in running.

Horse-races are desports of great men, and good in themselves, though many gentlemen by such means fall quite out of their fortunes.

Burton, quoted in Strutt's Sports and Pastimes, p. 106.

horse-racer (hòrs'rās'ēr), n. 1. One who keeps horses for the purpose of racing.

The first Lord Godolphin was a horse-racer as well as gambler.
Athenaeum, Sept. 22, 1883, p. 381.

2. One who rides in races; a jockey.

horse-racing (hòrs'rās'ing), n. The practice or sport of running horses.

horse-rack (hòrs'rak), n. A rack at which horses are hitched and baited.

He's a standin' out yander by the horse-rack.
J. C. Harris, Harper's [Mag.], LXXVI. 707.

horse-radish (hòrs'rad'ish), n. A cultivated cruciferous plant, Cochlearia Armoracia. 1, rhizome, with two leaves; 2, part of the inflorescence, with flowers and fruit; 3, leaf from the stem; 4, flower; 5, fruit, opened to show the seeds.

Cochlearia Armoracia, originally a native of middle Europe and western Asia, and also its root, which has a pungent taste, and is used in a grated state as a condiment. In medicine it is used as a stimulant and diuretic, and externally as a rubefacient. See Cochlearia 1.

horseradish-tree (hòrs'rad'ish-tré), n. A tree, Moringa pterygosperma, common in many parts of India, and cultivated there, as well as in various other tropical countries, for the sake of the fruit, which is eaten as a vegetable or pickled. It has pinnate leaves and long, 3-valved, pod-like capsules, from which ben-oil is obtained. The fresh root has a pungent odor and warm taste, much like that of the horseradish.

horse-railroad (hòrs'rál'rôd), n. A railroad on which cars are drawn by horses, first used in the streets of cities in the United States: called a tramway in Great Britain.

horse-rake (hòrs'râk), n. A large rake drawn by a horse. See rake.

horse-rider (hòrs'ri'dér), n. A circus-rider. [Eng.]

The horse-riders never mind what they say, sir; they're famous for it. Dickens, Hard Times, v.

horse-riding (hòrs'ri'ding), n. A circus. [Eng.] Stearns's horse-riding. Dickens, Hard Times, iii.

horse-rough (hòrs'ruf), n. A calk or ice-creep-er which may be fitted to the shoe of a horse to give him a foothold on frozen ground.

horse-run (hòrs'run), n. A contrivance for drawing up loaded wheelbarrows, by the help of a horse, from the bottoms of excavations for canals, docks, etc.

horse-runnigut, n. A horse-race. Davies.
The Forest of Galtres, . . . very notorious in these dates by reason of a solemn horse-runnigut, wherein the horse that outrunneth the rest hath for his prize a little golden bell. Holland, tr. of Camden, p. 723.

horse-sense (hòrs'sens'), n. A crude, instinctive kind of common sense, independent of instruction or experience; a coarse, robust, and conspicuous form of shrewdness often found in ignorant and rude persons; plain, practical good sense.

He was a plain man; his sympathies were with the people; he had what is roughly known as horse-sense, and he was homely. C. D. Warner, Backlog Studies, p. 133.

Happily, the latent horse-sense of the American people may be relied on, in the end, to abate the nuisance. New Eng. Jour. of Education, XIX. 377.

horseshoe (hòrs'shù), n. [ME. horscho (for hors-scho, var. horsiischo, horsiis cho—Prompt. Parv.); < horse + shoe.] 1. A shoe for a horse, consisting commonly of a narrow plate of iron bent into a form somewhat resembling the letter U, so as to accommodate itself to the shape of the horse's foot. Its parts are the toe, the two heels, the quarters between the toe and the heels, the calks, or projections from the lower part of each heel, the clip, a kind of claw, usually at the upper edge of the toe, for protecting the hoof and assisting in keeping the shoe in place, and the fullering, or crease in the lower face, in which the nail-holes, usually eight, are punched. The horseshoe, in its most primitive form, is of great antiquity. An old and very popular superstition, almost universally prevalent among peasantry, ascribes to the horseshoe (especially to one which has been found in the road by chance) the power of barring the passage of witches. For this purpose the shoe is nailed to the door or the threshold.

To be thrown into the Thames, and cooled, glowing hot, in that surge, like a horse-shoe.

Your wife's a witch, man; you should nail a horse-shoe on your chamber-door. Scott, Redgauntlet, ch. xi.

Nailing of horse-shoes (to thresholds) seems to have been practised as well to keep witches in as to keep them out. Hone's Year-Book, p. 953.

from the same source.] I. a. Belonging to a garden; relating to gardening: as, a hortulan calendar.

This hortulan calendar is yours, mindful of the honour once conferred on it, when you were pleased to suspend your nobler raptures, and think it worthy your transcribing.

Evelyn, Calendarium Hortense, Ep. Ded. to A. Cowley.

II. n. A bird: same as ortolan.

Hortulan (hòr-tū-lā'nus), n. [NL.: see hortulan and ortolan.] A genus of fringilline birds. The word is variously used: (a) By Vieillot (1807) for sundry American finches, now called Pipilo and Spiza. (b) By W. E. Leach (1816) for snow-bunting, now called Pterophanes.

hortus siccus (hòr'tus sik'us). [L. (the phrase appears to be NL.), lit. a dry garden: L. hortus, a garden, = Gr. χόρος, a yard, = AS. geard, E. yard?, of which garth and gard-en are other forms: see yard?, garth?, garden; L. siccus, dry, > ult. E. sack?, q. v.] A collection of specimens of plants carefully dried and preserved for botanical purposes; a herbarium.

A choice of old authors should be a florilegium, and not a botanist's hortus siccus, to which grasses are as important as the single shy blossom of a summer.

Lovell, Study Windows, p. 293.

hortyard, n. [A sophisticated form of orchard, earlier ortyard, simulating L. hortus, a garden: see hortus siccus and orchard.] An orchard.

Of all ornaments of house and home, a pleasant garden and hortyard, with a lively spring, is above all domestic delight, and meetest for the melancholy heart and brayne.

Bright, Treatise of Melancholy (1613), p. 320.

The hortyard entering, admires the fair
And pleasant fruits.

Sandys, tr. of Ovid's Metamorph. (ed. 1638), p. 290.

Horus (hòr'us), n. [LL. Horus, < Gr. Ὅρος, < Egypt. Hor.] In Egypt. myth., a divinity of dual relations. He was Horus the elder, a brother of Osiris, and Horus the child, the offspring of Osiris and Isis. By the Greeks of the decadence Horus the child was identified with Harpocrates, and his worship was also carried on in Rome. Like Ra, Horus was represented in art as hawk-headed. Also called Hor.

horyt, a. [E. dial. horry; < ME. hory, hoory, hori, once pl. horowe, foul, unclean; < AS. horig, once horig, foul, unclean (= MHG. horwic, horwig, horig, horg, muddy, filthy), < horu = OFries. horu = OS. horu, dirt, filth, = OHG. horo (horow, horaw), mud, filth; cf. AS. horh, horg, a clammy humor, phlegm, rheum. Hoary, a. moldy, is prob. the same word, mixed with hoary, gray: see hoary.] Impure; unclean; dirty; foul.

hosanna (hò-zan'ä), interj. and n. [Formerly also osanna; < LL. osanna (var. ozanna, ossanna, ossana), ML. also hosanna, < Gr. Ὡσαννά, Ὡσαννά (var. Ὡσανά, Ὡσαννά), repr. Heb. hōshānā nānā, lit. save, I pray (or we pray), < hōshānā, save, a stem of yāshā, be large (cf. Jesus, from the same stem), + nā, a particle denoting entreaty.] An exclamation praying God for deliverance, or an acclamation or ascription of praise to God. This exclamation originated from the Hebrew words rendered 'Save now' in Ps. cxviii. 25, a psalm forming part of the Hallel used at the Passover. The form hosanna is recorded in Mat. xxi. 9, 15, and in the parallel passages (Mark xi. 9, 10; John xii. 13), as used by the multitude in acclamation to Christ entering Jerusalem in triumph on the Sunday before his crucifixion, with the additions 'to the son of David' and 'in the highest.' It has been in liturgical use from very early times. It appears in the Clementine Liturgy, in the response to the Sancta Sancta, and in the liturgical directions of the book called The Teaching of the Twelve Apostles. In both the Western and the principal Eastern liturgies it follows the Sanctus. The English Prayer-Book of 1549 retained the hosanna (osanna) in the first 'hosanna in excelsis,' but altered the second to 'Glory be to thee, O Lord, in the highest.' (See Luke xix. 38.) Later revisions omitted the first hosanna and changed 'in the highest' to 'most High.' See Benedictus.

Blessed be the kingdom of our father David, that cometh in the name of the Lord: Hosanna in the highest.

Mark xi. 10.

Loud hosannas fill'd
The eternal regions.

Milton, P. L., iii. 348.

Day or Sunday of Hosanna or of Hosannas, Hosanna Sunday, in the early church, in the medieval Western Church, and among the Nestorians, Palm Sunday.

hose (höz), n. sing. or pl.; pl. formerly hoses or hosen. [L. hose, hose, pl. hosen, < AS. hosa, *pl. hosan (glossed 'caliga vel ocrea') = MD. hose, D. hoos, hose, stocking, spout, water-spout, = MLG. hose, hase = OHG. hosa, MHG. G. hose, breeches, = Icel. hosa, a covering for the leg between the knee and ankle, a kind of gaiter, = Dan. hose, pl. hoser, hose, stockings. The Rom. forms, OF. hose, OSP. huesa, OFg. osa, It. uosa, ML. mosa, osa, are of G. origin; W. and Corn. hos are from E.] 1. Originally, a garment covering the legs and the waist, worn by men. The hose of the middle ages generally covered the person from the waist to the toes; they were secured to the upper garment by points or some similar device. At times the covering of one leg and side of the body was of different material and color from that of the other side. In the sixteenth century the leg-coverings were divided into two parts, and the word hose was applied rather to the breeches, the covering of the lower part of the leg and foot being called the stocking or nether-stock.

Departage of hire hoses in whit and reed.

Doublet and hose ought to show itself courageous to petticoat.
Shak., As you like it, II. 4.

And he had on yet all this while a paire of hoses of Deere-skinnes with the haire on.

Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 433.

Towards the close of the [sixteenth] century the hose of that period also became "breeches"; and so, in process of time, the old and long-used word "hose" came to be retained only as an equivalent for "stockings."

Encyc. Brit., VI. 472.

2. In present use (as either singular or plural), covering for the feet and lower part of the legs; stockings. Short stockings, not reaching to the knee, are distinctively called half-hose or socks, or, rarely, ankle-hose.

The belted plaid and tartan hose

Did ne'er more graceful limbs disclose.

Scott, L. of the L., II. 25.

The article of attire in which he took chief pleasure was hose; and the better to show the gay colors of these, he wore low-cut shoes of the finest calf-skin, turned up at the toes.

The Century, XXXV. 950.

3. A flexible tube or pipe for conveying a fluid to a required point, as water for the service of a fire-engine, for watering a garden, etc. Hose of the larger kinds for such uses, to which the term is usually restricted, is made chiefly of leather, gutta-percha, cotton, or india-rubber. Smaller tubing, as for gas in a drop-light, for acoustic instruments, etc., to which the name may also be applied, is made of many different materials and in various ways.

It was now towards sunset on Saturday, and the inhabitants were washing the fronts of the houses with the hose.
C. D. Warner, Their Pilgrimage, p. 148.

4. The hollow part of a spade, or other tool of a like kind, which receives the end of the shaft or handle.—5†. In printing, formerly, upright iron rods, which connected the spindle of the old hand-press with its platen, and regulated its movement. Mozon.—6. The sheaf of corn. [Prov. Eng.]—7†. The outer covering of straw or corn. Ellis, Modern Husbandman (1750), II. i. 2.—8. In golf, the socket in the iron head of a golf-club into which the shaft fits.—Ankle-hose. See def. 2.—Hose of mail. See chainmail.

hose-cart (hōz'kärt), n. Same as hose-carriage.

hose-clamp (hōz'klāmp), n. A flexible band with a screw for drawing the ends of two pieces of hose together.

hose-company (hōz'kum'pā-nī), n. A body of firemen to attend and man a hose-carriage.

hose-coupling (hōz'kup'ling), n. A joint-piece, or a pair of interlocking connecting pieces, by which sections of hose can be joined together end to end.—Half-hose coupling. See coupling.

hose-hook (hōz'hūk), n. 1. A hook for lifting the hose of a fire-engine.—2†. pl. In printing, the hooks by which the platen of the old form of printing-press was suspended.

hose-in-hose (hōz'in-'hōz), n. A gardeners' name for certain flowers in which the corolla appears to be double. This state of things is brought about usually by the calyx becoming petaloid, as in Rhododendron (Azalea) umana of the gardens, but also by actual duplication of the corolla, as in Primula vulgaris, or by the presence of an inner series of petal-like stamens, which by their cohesion form a second pseudo-corolla within the first, as in Datura fastuosa, Gloxinia, etc.

hose-jumper (hōz'jum'pēr), n. Same as hose-bridge.

hoseman (hōz'mān), n.; pl. hosemen (-men). One of the men who manage the hose of a fire-engine, and direct the stream.

The electricity would descend by the stream of water and enter the bodies of the hosemen managing the apparatus.
Elect. Rev. (Amer.), XI. 2.

hoseant, n. An old plural of hose.

hose-protector (hōz'prō-tek'tōr), n. Same as hose-bridge.

hosier, n. A Middle English variant of hosier. hose-reel (hōz'rēl), n. 1. A reel or drum on which hose is wound when not in use or for conveyance.—2. A hose-carriage. [Rare.]

hose-shield (hōz'shēld), n. Same as hose-bridge.

hoshen (hō'shen), n. [Sc., also hoeshins (ingeniously accom. to shins), altered with additional pl. suffix from ME. hosen, pl. of hose, q. v.] Same as hogger.

hosier (hō'zhēr), n. [ME. hosier, hosyer, hoseare, hosiare, hosegere (also hosier); < hose + -ier, as in grazier, brazier, etc.] One who deals in hose (stockings and socks), or in goods knitted or woven like hose, such as undergarments, jerseys, cardigans, and the like. Formerly this term was applied to tailors who sold men's garments ready-made.

hosieri (hō'zhēr-i), n. [< hosier + -y, or < hose + -i-ery; see hosier and -ery.] 1. Specifically, hose of all kinds for the foot and leg; stockings and socks collectively; by extension, the whole class of goods in which a hosier deals; the stock of a hosier.—2. A factory where stockings, undergarments, etc., are woven by machinery.—3. The business of a hosier.—Briggrigan hosieri, a fine cotton hosier, of which the threads are unusually hard, having very little nap or woolly surface, so called from the town of Briggrigan in the county of Dublin, Ireland, where it is made.

hosiomartyr (hō'si-ō-mär'tēr), n. [< Gr. ὁσιος, holy, + μάρτυρ, martyr.] In the calendar of the Greek Church, a martyr who was a monk or a nun.

hospice (hōs'pis), n. [< F. hospice = Sp. Pg. hospicio = It. ospizio, < L. hospitium, hospital, a lodging, an inn, < hospes (hospit-), a host, a guest; see *host*².] A house of entertainment and refuge for strangers; especially, such an establishment kept by monks on some passes in the Alps to give shelter and aid to travelers. Originally they were probably for pilgrims on the journey to Rome. The best-known hospice is that of the Great St. Bernard.

hospitable (hōs'pi-tā-bl), a. [< OF. hospitalis = Sp. hospedable = It. ospitalibile, < *ML. as if hospitabilis, < hospitare, receive as a guest; see hospitate, *host*², v., and cf. hospital.] 1. Kind and cordial toward strangers or guests; freely affording shelter and food; extending a generous welcome to visitors.

We were received with open arms by all our old friends; and when they do open their arms, there are no people so kind and so hospitable as the Scotch.
Lady Holland, Sidney Smith, viii.

Whom all men rate as kind and hospitable.
Tennyson, Princess, i.

2. Characteristic of or affording generous or friendly entertainment; indicating or devoted to hospitality: as, hospitable manners; a hospitable table.

His hospitable gate
The richer and the poor stood open to receive.
Drayton, Polyolbion.

For harbour at a thousand doors they knock'd,
Not one of all the thousand but was lock'd;
At last an hospitable house they found.

Dryden, tr. of Ovid's Metamorph., viii.
It was really delightful to see the oldquire seated in his hereditary elbow chair, by the hospitable fireside of his ancestors.
Irving, Sketch-Book, p. 247.

3. Figuratively, generous in mind; free in receiving and entertaining that which is presented to the mind: as, hospitable to new ideas.

It (the religion of the Greeks) was hospitable to novelties and was composite in character.
Amer. Jour. Philol., VIII. 88.

hospitableness (hōs'pi-tā-bl-nes), n. The quality of being hospitable; hospitality.

His [Abraham's] benignity to strangers, and hospitableness, is remarkable among all his deeds of goodness.
Barrow, Works, I. xxxi.

hospitably (hōs'pi-tā-blī), adv. In a hospitable manner; with generous and cordial entertainment.

The former Hyeth as piously and hospitably as the other.

Swift.
hospitager (hōs'pi-tāj), n. [= Pg. hospedagem, < ML. hospitagium, accom. form of hospitaticum, a right of exacting entertainment, hospitality, < hospitare, receive as a guest; see hospitate and *host*².] Hospitality.

Of vile ungentleness, or hospitages breach.
Spenser, F. Q., III. x. 6.

hospital (hōs'pi-tal), a. and n. [I. a. < OF. hospital = Sp. hospital = It. ospedale, a., < L. hospitalis, of or relating to a guest or host; as a noun, a guest; < hospes (hospit-), a host, a guest; see *host*², n. Hence hospitality, II. n. < ME. hospital, hospitale (also abbr. spital, early mod. E. spital, spittle: see *spittle*²), < OF. hospital, a hospital, mod. F. hôpital = Fr. Pg. hospital = It. ospedale = G. Dan., etc., hospital, < ML. hospitale, a large house, a palace, an inn, neut. sing. (cf. L. hospitalia, apartments for guests, neut. pl.) of L. hospitalis, of or relating to a guest or host; see I. The same word, contracted, appears in E. as hostel (of ME. origin) and hotel (of recent introduction); a fourth form appears in the obs. *spittle*².] 1†. A Hospital.

I am to be a guest to this hospital maid [Venice] a good while yet.
Hovell, Letters, I. i. 35.

II. n. 1†. A place of shelter or entertainment; an inn.

Whenas they spide a goodly castle, plaste
Foreby a river in a pleasaunt dale,
Which choosing for that evenings hospitale,
They thither march.
Spenser, F. Q., II. ix. 10.

2. An institution or establishment for dispensing hospitality or caring for the needy; an asylum for shelter or maintenance. This old sense still appears in the term foundling hospital, and in the names of some institutions in Great Britain founded for either the care or education, or both, of persons in need of help: as, Greenwich Hospital for retired seamen, a national institution; Christ's Hospital for the re-education of boys, founded by the corporation of London, chartered in 1553, and often called the Blue-Coat school, from the uniform of its pupils.

When the kynge Amount was deed, the kynge Bohors cleped hys companye, and seide that gladly woulde he ther make an hospital wher-ynne a man myght euer after serue our lord god for the soule of hym as longe as the worlde dured.
Meilin (E. E. T. S.), ii. 369.

The Foundling Hospital of London was incorporated by Royal Charter in 1739.
Encyc. Brit., IX. 433.

3. Now, specifically, an establishment or institution for the care of the sick or wounded, or of such as require medical or surgical treatment. Hospitals are either public or private, free or paying, or both combined, and general or special with respect to the kinds of disease or classes of persons admitted. In ancient Greece the sanctuaries of Asclepius included establishments closely akin to medieval and modern hospitals.

A Roman lady named Fabiola, in the fourth century, founded at Rome, as an act of penance, the first public hospital, and the charity planted by that woman's hand overspread the world.
Lecky, European Morals, II. 85.

At the end of the last and beginning of this century, fever hospitals were generally called "houses of recovery."
Encyc. Brit., XII. 302.

Convalescent hospital. See convalescent.—Cottage hospital, a small and inexpensive establishment, simply organized, and designed to provide hospital accommodation and care in a small and isolated community. The first cottage hospital in England was established at Cranleigh in 1859, and was merely an ordinary cottage.—Cottage-hospital system a system of which the aim is to provide small and isolated communities with inexpensive, serviceable, and easily managed hospitals.—General hospital, a hospital to which cases of all kinds were formerly admitted. Under later provisions and regulations, however, certain classes of disease may be excluded from a general hospital, such as smallpox, venereal disease, dementia, etc.—Hospital gangrene. See gangrene.—Hospital Saturday. See Hospital Sunday.—Hospital steward. (a) A non-commissioned staff-officer in the United States army who compounds prescriptions, administers medicine, and has general charge, under the direction of an army surgeon, of the sick and of hospital property. (b) Hospital stewards are graded as first, second, and third class and are permanently attached to the medical corps. (c) In the navy, the designation formerly given to the apothecary.—Hospital Sunday, a Sunday set apart annually in all the churches, chapels, etc., for a special collection of contributions for the benefit of the poor hospitals. In London the first Hospital Sunday was observed in June, 1873, in response to an invitation sent out to the churches from the Mansion House, and since that time the collection has always been made in June. In New York Hospital Sunday, appointed for a similar collection for the hospitals, falls on the last Sunday in the year. The money so collected is distributed among the hospitals in proportion to the number of free patients, without regard to sect or creed. On the preceding Saturday, known as Hospital Saturday, similar collections are made in the synagogues, and also in many places of business. In London, on Hospital Saturday, in addition to the collections made at places of business, factories, etc., ladies take charge of boxes in the streets.—Lock hospital, a general name in Great Britain for a hospital for the treatment of venereal diseases. (Thomson, Med. Dict.) The origin of the name is indicated in a bequest made in 1463 by Ralph Holland, a merchant tailor, of twenty shillings to the "Lock lazhar-house, outside St. George's gate." This "Lock lazhar-house," which was so called as being specially isolated or quarantined, afterward became an infirmary for syphilitic cases, and seems to have given the name to hospitals of that class.—Magdalen hospital, a house or establishment into which prostitutes are received with a view to their reformation; a female reformatory. Also called Magdalen asylum.—Marine hospital, a hospital established at a seaport or elsewhere for the relief of sick seamen. In the United States a marine hospital for merchant seamen, under the charge of the supervising surgeon-general, an officer of the Treasury Department, has been established at nearly every large seaport and at several stations on the lakes and rivers.—Maternity hospital, a hospital for the reception of women about to give birth to children.—Naval hospital, in the United States, a hospital for the medical care of officers and men of the navy, under charge of naval surgeons.—Special hospital, one of a class of hospitals set apart for the reception and treatment of cases in certain special diseases, or in special emergencies, as smallpox, ophthalmic, and lying-in hospitals, hospitals for incurables, etc.

hospitalary, n. [ML. hospitalarius: see hospitaler.] A hospitaler.

The Order of the Dutch knights, commonly called the Hospitaries of Jerusalem. Hakluyt's Voyages, I. 144.

hospitaler (hos'pi-tal-er), n. [Also written hospitalier; ME. hospitaler, hospitaler, hospitaler, OF. hospitalier = Pr. hospitaller, esptaler = Sp. hospitalero = Pg. hospitaleiro, ML. hospitalarius, L. hospitale, a hospital: see hospital and -er.] One devoted to the care of the sick or the needy in a hospital or hospitals; specifically, a member of one of the medieval communities of laymen, monks, knights, etc., who bound themselves to observe certain monastic rules, generally the rule of Augustine, and to devote themselves to the care of the poor and the sick in hospitals. The principal order was the Brethren of the Hospital of St. John of Jerusalem, founded for pilgrims at Jerusalem about A. D. 1085. They are best known as the Knights Hospitalers of St. John (in full, Knights Hospitalers of the Order of St. John of Jerusalem), and in history as Knights of Rhodes or of Malta. (See below.) The Teutonic Knights developed in a similar way. Other orders were the Hospitalers of Burgos, Hospital Brethren of the Holy Spirit, etc.

Toward the South, a 200 Pass, is the great Hospital of Seynt John; of the whiche the Hospitalers hadde here foundacion. Mandeville, Travels, p. 81.

Amalric, leaving Cyprus under the administration of the Hospitalers, transferred his court to Acre. Stubbs, Medieval and Modern Hist., p. 171.

Order of the Hospitalers of St. John of Jerusalem, a body of military monks, which took its origin from an earlier community, not military in character, under whose auspices a hospital and a church had been founded in Jerusalem. Its military organization was perfected in the twelfth century. After the retaking of Jerusalem by the Moslems, these knights defended Acre in vain, took shelter in Cyprus, and in the fourteenth century occupied the island of Rhodes. In 1522 the island of Rhodes was seized by the Turks, and the knights, after some wanderings, were given possession of the island of Malta, the government of which island they administered until it was occupied by Napoleon Bonaparte in 1798. The badge of the order was the cross of eight points, without any central disk, and consisting in fact of four barbed arrow-heads meeting at their points, the well-known Maltese cross. This is modified in modern times, with slight differences for the different nations in which branches of the order have survived. At different times the order has been called officially Knights of Rhodes and Knights of Malta. It maintains to the present day a certain independent existence; but until 1879 there was no grand master, and the order was governed by a council residing at Rome. The appointment of a new grand master in 1879 may indicate a change in the constitution of the order. That branch of the order called the batallion of Brandenburg was revived and recognized as a separate order by the King of Prussia in 1852.

hospital-fever (hos'pi-tal-fē-vēr), n. 1. Typhus fever.—2. Pyemia.

hospitalism (hos'pi-tal-izm), n. [L. hospital + -ism.] The hygienic evils incident to old, crowded, and carelessly conducted hospitals, especially the liability under such conditions to erysipelas, septicemia, etc. The term was introduced by Sir J. Simpson of Edinburgh in 1869.

The sick require protection against the evils which they themselves create, and which collectively are known as hospitalism. The Nation, Dec. 16, 1875, p. 383, note.

hospitality (hos-pi-tal'i-ti), n.; pl. hospitalities (-tiz). [L. hospitalitē = Pr. hospitalitat = Sp. hospitalidad = Pg. hospitalidade = It. ospitalità, L. hospitalitas (-t-s), hospitality, L. hospitalis, hospitable: see hospital, a.] The act or practice of one who is hospitable; reception and entertainment of strangers or guests without reward, or with liberality and kindness.

Julius Caesar made his abode here, who kept very honorable hospitality in this Cite. Coryat, Crudities, I. 126.

I could not but take particular notice of the lesson of hospitality the governor taught . . . by distributing about to all the Arabs of the good fare they had brought, even before he had served himself. Pococke, Description of the East, I. 48.

Lifting the ceremonious three-cornered hat, and offering the fugacious hospitalities of the snuff-box. Lowell, Cambridge Thirty Years Ago.

The open-handed spirit, frank and blithe, Of ancient hospitality. Lowell, Under the Willows.

hospital-ship (hos'pi-tal-ship), n. A vessel fitted up for the care of sick or wounded seamen, or of patients taken from a ship in quarantine.

hospitaler (hos'pi-tāt), v. [L. hospitari, dep., be a guest, ML. hospitare, act or entertain as a guest, L. hospes (hospit-), a guest, a host: see *host*², n. and v.] I. trans. To receive with hospitality; treat as a guest.

II. intrans. To be the recipient of hospitality; reside or lodge as a guest.

That always chooses an empty shell, and this hospitaler with the living animal in the same shell. N. Grew, Museum.

hospitia, n. Plural of hospitium.

hospiticide (hos-pit'i-sid), n. [LL. hospitica, L. hospes (hospit-), a guest (see *host*²), + -cida, killer, C. cadere, kill.] One who murders his guests. Bailey, 1731.

hospitiously (hos-pish'us), a. [L. hospitium, hospitality (see hospice), + -e.] OF. -ous.] Hospitably.

We glory in th' hospitiously rites our grandsires did commend. Chapman, Iliad, vi.

Ouse, having Ouleny past, . . . Through those rich fields doth run, till lastly, in her pride, The shire's hospitiously town she in her course divide. Drayton, Polyolbion, xxii. 24.

hospitium (hos-pish'i-um), n.; pl. hospitia (-ā). [L.: see hospice.] 1. An inn or a place for the reception of strangers; a hospice.—2. In Eng. law, an inn of court.

hospodar (hos'pō-dār), n. [Rum. hospodar, Upper Serbian hospodar, Lower Serbian gospodar, Pol. hospodar (borrowed), prop. gospodarz, Serv. gospodar, Russ. gospodore, Oulg. gospodare, etc., lord, master, OBulg. Russ. gospode, Bulg. gospod, Serv. gospod, etc., lord, the Lord, God, = L. hospes (hospit-), host: see *host*².] A title of dignity formerly borne by the vassal princes of Moldavia and Wallachia, in earlier times by the princes of Lithuania and the kings of Poland, and still used as a title (gosudar) of the Czar of Russia.

host¹ (hōst), n. [ME. host, ost, OF. host = Pr. ost = Sp. hoste, hueste = Pg. hoste = It. oste, a host, an army, L. hostis, OL. fostis, a stranger, foreigner, enemy, pl. hostes, the enemy, hence in ML. sing. hostis, an army; = OBulg. Russ., etc., goste, a guest, visitor, stranger, = AS. gæst, E. guest, etc.: see *guest*¹. Hence *host*² (a contracted compound), and possibly *host*³, q. v.] 1. An army; a multitude of men organized for war.

In that See was Pharaoh drowned and alle his Host that he ladde. Mandeville, Travels, p. 57.

A host so great as covered all the field. Dryden.

He strove with the heathen host in vain, And fell with the flower of his people slain. Bryant, Rizpah.

2. Any great number or multitude.

Evening approached; but, oh! what hosts of foes Were never to behold that evening close! Addison, The Campaign.

Arm'd himself in panoply complete Of heavenly temper, [he] furnishes with arms . . . The sacramental host of God's elect! Cowper, Task, ii. 349.

Host of heaven, the heavenly bodies; the sun, moon, and stars.

Lest thou, . . . when thou seest the sun, and the moon, and the stars, even all the host of heaven, shoulddest be driven to worship them. Deut. iv. 19.

The golden sun, The planets, all the infinite host of heaven. Bryant, Thanatopsis.

Lord of hosts, a title of Jehovah, found more than 260 times in the Old Testament; sometimes also Lord God of hosts, or God of hosts. The term hosts in this phrase includes all the myriads of angels who people the celestial spheres, and includes the celestial spheres themselves. It is probably given with reference to the idolatrous worship of Jehovah, and as a means of asserting His universal supremacy.

host¹ (hōst), v. i. [host¹, n. Cf. hosting, n.] To assemble or move as an army. [Rare.]

The prince of Wales was ready in the field with his people, and advanced forward with them towards his enemies, an hosting pace. Holinshed.

With scanty force, where should he lift the steel, While hosting foes immeasurably wheel? J. Barlow, Vision of Columbus, vi.

host² (hōst), n. [ME. host, ost, hoste, oste, OF. hoste, F. hôte = Pr. hoste, oste = Sp. It. oste, a host, innkeeper, L. hospes (hospit-), fem. hospita, an entertainer, a host, also a sojourner, visitor, guest; hence, a foreigner, a stranger; prob. contr. of orig. hostipes* (hosti-pit*), lit. 'guest-master,' one who receives guests or strangers (= OBulg. Russ., etc., gospode, lord, master, the Lord: see hospodar), L. hostis, a stranger (see *host*¹), + -pes (-pit-), connected with potis, powerful, orig. lord, = Gr. πόσις in δεσπότης, lord, master (see despot) = Skt. pati, master, governor, lord: see potent, posse. From this L. hospes are derived also E. hospitable, hospital, hospitate, hostel, hostler, ostler, hostelry, hotel, spittle, etc.] 1. One who receives and entertains another in his own house, whether gratuitously or for pay; an entertainer; specifically, the landlord of a public house or inn: the correlative of *guest*¹.

Greet chiere made our host us everichon.

Chaucer, Gen. Prolog. to C. T., l. 747.

Homer never entertained either guests or hosts with long speeches till the mouth of hunger be stopped.

Sir P. Sidney.

London hath receiv'd,

Like a kind host, the dauphin and his powers.

Shak., C. John, v. 1.

2. An animal or a plant in relation to a parasite habitually dwelling in or upon it. The correlative term, in either case, is guest. See commensal, *quest*¹, inquiline, parasite, hyperparasite. (a) In botany the term is used chiefly with reference to parasitic fungi, such as Tredrea, Ustilago, Erysiphe, etc. Some species of fungi are confined to a single host, some are found on a number of related plants, while others pass through the different stages of their development on very unlike hosts, as, for example, the heterocercous rusts. The term is also applied to the plants upon which the dodder (Cuscuta), the mistletoe (Viscum, Phoradendron), and others are parasitic.

That curious phenomenon included under the term heterocercism, which consists in the growth of one generation of a parasitic fungus upon one host, and the development of another generation upon a different host. Encyc. Brit., IV. 162.

(b) In zoölogy the term is a very general and comprehensive one, since almost all animals are infested, or liable to infestation, by parasites of some kind; and some parasites are themselves hosts of others.

Almost every group of birds becomes the host of some specific or varietal form (of parasites) with distinct adaptations. Nature, XXX. 621.

3. In mineral, a mineral which incloses another.—4. One who is entertained by another as his guest; a guest.

Than he made his hoste the beste chere that he myght, and made hem richely be served at ese in a feire chambur. Mervin (E. E. T. S.), iii. 684.

5. [With sense of L. hospitium: see hospice.] An inn; a lodging.

Make redy to me an ooste or hous for to dwelle inne. Wyclif, Phil. 22 (Oxf.).

This mayden that was feire com to Bredigan, whereas the kynge sojourned, and was at hoste with a riche burgeys. Mervin (E. E. T. S.), ii. 171.

Your goods, that lay at host, sir, in the Centaur. Shak., C. of E., v. 1.

To reckon without (or formerly before) one's host, to count up the cost of one's entertainment without consulting the host or landlord (whose reckoning is likely to be higher, or at least more careful); hence, not to consider all the circumstances; to reach a conclusion on insufficient data, or without taking into account some important fact or facts.

But thei reckoned before their host, and so payed more then their shotte came to. Hall, Henry VI., i. 49. (Hallwell.)

The old English proverb telleth us that "they that reckon without their host are to reckon twice"; and so it fared with this infuriated people. Heylyn, Hist. Reformation, I. 93.

host² (hōst), v. [OF. hoster, oster, L. hospitare, lodge, L. hospes (hospit-), a host, a guest: see *host*², n. Cf. hospitate.] I. intrans. To lodge, as at an inn; receive entertainment; be a guest. [Rare.]

They say that God talks with him face to face, Hosts at his house.

Sylvester, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, ii, The Vocation.

Go, bear it to the Centaur, where we host.

Shak., C. of E., i. 2.

II. trans. To give entertainment to; receive as a guest.

Such was that Hag, unmeet to host such guests. Spenser, F. Q., IV. viii. 27.

And caused hym to be hosted with a worshipfull man of that cite called Chremes. Sir T. Elyot, The Governour, ii. 12.

host³ (hōst), n. [ME. host, hoste, hoost, oste, also hostie, OF. hostie, F. hostie = Pr. Sp. Pg. hostia = It. ostia, a sacrifice or thing sacrificed, L. hostia, OL. fostia, an animal sacrificed, a victim, sacrifice (in ML. applied to the consecrated bread), prob. L. hostire (OL.), strike; cf. hosta, a spear: see hastate, and *gad*¹, *goad*¹.] 1. An offering; a sacrifice.

Anon, said Isaac: Father, heer I see

Knife, fire and faggot, ready instantly:

But wher's your Hoste?

Sylvester, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, ii, The Fathers.

2. In the Western Ch.: (a) The sacramental victim in the eucharist; Christ offered under the species of bread and wine, or under either species separately. According to the teaching of the Roman Catholic Church, not only is Christ as both God and Man in the sacrament of the eucharist and in every part of it, but the substances of bread and wine cease to exist after consecration. The outward acts of adoration are therefore not directed to bread and wine, but only to Christ; and the sacrament is accordingly to be worshiped with latria, the worship due to God only.

The priests were singing, and the organ sounded, And then anon the great cathedral bell. It was the elevation of the Host.

Longfellow, Spanish Student, l. 3.

(b) One of the pieces of bread used for consecration in the mass or eucharist; an altar-bread, oblate, or wafer. It is unleavened, small, thin, flat, circular, and generally stamped with a cross, IHS, the figure of the crucified Christ, or the Agnus Dei. The word is used both of the unconsecrated bread and of the sacrament under the form of bread. See altar-bread, oblate.

After the consecration [in the Mozarabic missal] the host is broken into nine fragments, which are so arranged on the paten as to form a cross.

Rock, Church of our Fathers, i. 105.

Adoration of the Host, in the Rom. Cath. Ch., the act of reverence or worship shown to the sacrament of the eucharist as Christ's body and blood; latria or divine worship rendered to Christ under the sacramental species, especially that of bread. The Host is adored immediately after consecration and at other times, as when taken by a priest to a sick person.—Blood of the Host. See bloody bread, under bloody.—Elevation of the Host. See elevation, 7.

host³, v. t. [*host*³, n.] To administer the sacrament to. Nares.

He fell sick and like to die, whereupon he was shriven and would have been hosted, and he durst not for fear of casting.

Scogan's Jests, p. 27.

host⁴ (höst), n. Same as hoast. [Scotch.]

hostage¹ (hos'tāj), n. [*ME. hostage, ostage, < OF. hostage, ostage, mod. Russ. Pol. suka, Hung. szuka, etc., a bitch. Root unknown.] 1. A dog; specifically, a dog of a breed or variety used in the chase, as in hunting the boar, the deer, the fox, the hare, or the otter. The principal breeds of dogs distinctively classed as hounds (sometimes considered as constituting a species, Canis agas) are the beagle, bloodhound, buckhound, foxhound, greyhound, harrier, and staghound. (See these words.) Hounds commonly hunt by scent, and are for the most part used in numbers together, called packs, to run down and capture or kill the game. Many kinds of dogs are readily bred or trained for this purpose, as it is the mode of hunting most natural to wild dogs and wolves. In England hound without qualification means a foxhound: as, to follow the hounds.

He saw an hydous hound dwell
Withinne that hows that was full fell;
Of that hound grette drede he had.

Visions of Tundale, p. 25.

Sleep! the deer is in his den;

Sleep! thy hounds are by thee lying.

Scott, L. of the L., l. (song).

2. A mean, contemptible fellow; a dastard; a poltroon: as, a low hound; a sly hound.

Thanne shal borel clerkes ben abashed to blame zow or to greue,

And carpen nouzts as thei carpen now and calle zow dounbe houndes.

Piers Plowman (B), x. 287.

3. Same as houndfish, 1.

The species both of Mustelus and of Rhinotriacis . . . share the name of hound . . . doubtless due to their following their prey in packs.

Stand. Nat. Hist., III. 82.

4. The oldwife, or long-tailed duck, Harelda glacialis: so called from its gabbie, likened to the cry of a pack of hounds. [Newfoundland.]—5. Naut., a projection at the masthead on either side, serving as a support for the trestle-trees of large or the rigging of smaller vessels. Also called hounding.—6. Either of two pieces of wood used in artillery-limbers to connect the splinter-bar and pole with the axle.—7. Either of a pair of side-bars or horizontal braces for reinforcing various parts of the running-gear of a vehicle.—Gabriel hounds, in English Wagon Running-gears.

2. To hunt or pursue with or as if with hounds: as, to hound deer.

If the wolves had been hounded by tigers.

Sir R. L'Estrange.

3. To pursue or harass as if with hounds: as, to hound one on to ruin.

I shall be hounded up and down the world;

Now every villain that is wretch enough

To take the price of blood dreams of my throat.

Uvray, Calus Marius, iv. 2.

It is to be hounded off and shouted down.

Pop. Sci. M., XXXIII 68.

4. To follow like a hound; track; trail.

It is no more but by following and as it were hounding nature in her wanderings, to be able to lead her afterwards to the same place again.

Bacon, Advancement of Learning, ii.

To hound out, to set on; encourage to do injury to others. Ribton-Turner, Vagrants and Vagrancy, p. 350 (note).

Jesus saith unto her, Woman, . . . mine hour is not yet come.

John ii. 4.

I cried, Waken, gude master,

For now is the hour and time.

Lord John (Child's Ballads, l. 136).

The boast of heraldry, the pomp of power,

And all that beauty, all that wealth e'er gave,

Await alike th' inevitable hour.

Gray, Elegy.

Their hour grows stupefy me—not a fiddle nor a card after eleven! Sheridan, The Kivals, i. 1.

2. The time marked or indicated by a timepiece; the particular time of day: as, what is the hour? at what hour shall we meet?

Imo. What hour is it?

Lady. Almost midnight, madam.

Shak., Cymbeline, ii. 2.

3. The twenty-fourth part of a civil day, or the twelfth part of a natural day or night.

This division of time was invented by the Babylonians. Until modern times the hour was commonly considered as the twelfth part of the interval from sunrise to sunset or from sunset to sunrise. Until some time in the eighteenth century mean time was not used for ordinary purposes. Thus the Italians began the day half an hour after sunset, and reckoned 24 hours in each day. Until watches came into common use, in the seventeenth century, the time of day was determined ordinarily by the altitude of the sun, as in the following extract from Palladius, where the length of the shadow of a staff 4 feet long placed vertically determines the hours of the day reckoned from sunrise. Abbreviated h.

With October Marche hours feet both even

The first hath XXV. feet, XV

Feet hath the seconde hour, the thirde XI,

The fourth the fifth VIII. and V. up six sustene,

And six hath V. In VI. VII. demene,

And so goe forth. X. hath feet thries V.

XI goth with XXV. blyve.

Palladius, Husbandrie (E. E. T. S.), p. 139.

It is sixteen hours or two small days journey with a loaded caravan from Baalbec to Damascus.

Tennyson, Geraint.

4. pl. (a) Set times of prayer; the canonical hours (which see, under canonical). (b) The offices or services prescribed for the canonical hours, or a book containing them. See book of hours, below.—5. [cap.] In Gr. myth., one of the Hours or Hours, the goddesses of the seasons and guardians of the gates of heaven. They were held especially to personify the agreeable characteristics of the seasons, were closely associated with the Graces, and were attached to the train of Aphrodite. In art and poetry they were represented as young and graceful, decked with flowers and jewels.

While universal Pan,
Knit with the Graces and the Hours in dance, Led on the eternal spring. Milton, P. L., iv. 267.

At the eleventh hour. See eleventh.—Babylonian hour. (a) A twelfth part of a civil day. (b) The hour reckoned from sunrise as the beginning of the day.—Book of hours, in the Rom. Cath. Ch., a book of devotion containing offices for private use especially during the canonical hours, in addition to those appointed in the breviary or portiforium: often called simply the hours. Many medieval books of hours are still preserved in manuscript, or printed, and ornamented with beautiful illuminations, paintings, etc. The most widely used of these among the laity as well as among ecclesiastics were the "Hours of the Blessed Virgin," or "Hours of Our Lady."—Canonical hours. See canonical.—Eight-hour law, a law limiting the time of work of certain classes of working men to eight hours a day. The United States Congress passed an eight-hour law in 1883, applying to persons engaged in government work, and this example was followed by several States. Laws fixing eight hours as the general limit of a day's work have been enacted in several of the States; the first was passed in California in 1887.—Equinoctial hour, a twenty-fourth part of a mean solar day, being the length of a temporary hour at the equinoxes.—Forty hours, in the Rom. Cath. Ch., a continuous exposition of the eucharist for forty hours. See exposition of the sacrament, under exposition.—Hour angle. See angle³.—Hours of prayer. Same as canonical hours (which see, under canonical).—In a good hour, fortunately.

hour-circle (our'sér'kl), n. In astron.: (a) Any great circle of the sphere which passes through the two poles: so called because the hour of the day is ascertained when the circle upon which the sun is for the time being is ascertained. (b) A circle upon an equatorial telescope lying parallel to the plane of the earth's equator, and graduated into hours and subdivisions of hours.

hour-glass (our'gläs), n. and a. I. n. 1. An instrument for measuring time, consisting of a glass vessel constricted to a narrow passage in the middle, through which a quantity of sand, or sometimes of mercury, runs from the upper part into the lower in exactly an hour. At the end of the hour the glass may be reversed, when the sand will run back for another hour. Hour-glasses are now seldom used, though formerly very common. Similar instruments intended to mark shorter intervals are named accordingly, as a half-hour or a ten-minute glass. A three-minute glass, to boil eggs by, is called an egg-glass.

I should not see the sandy hour-glass run,
But I should think of shallows and of flats.

Shak., M. of V., i. 1.

Time, like a preacher in the days of the Puritans, turned the hour-glass on his high pulpit, the church belfry.

Longfellow, Hyperion, iv. 5.

In the Koran the hours are represented as beautiful virgins, endowed with unfading youth and immunity from all disease. Their company is to form the chief felicity of the faithful.

Or, thronging all one porch of Paradise,
A group of Hours bow'd to see
The dying Islamite, with hands and eyes
That said, We wait for thee.

Tennyson, Palace of Art.

hour-line (our'lin), n. In astron., a line indicating the hour; a line on which the shadow of the gnomon falls at a given hour.

hourly (our'li), a. [< hour + -ly.] Happening or done every hour; occurring hour by hour; continuing from hour to hour; hence, frequent; often repeated.

Honour, riches, marriage-blessing,
Long continuance, and increasing,
Hourly joys be still upon you!

Shak., Tempest, iv. 1 (song).

We must live in hourly expectation of having those troops recalled. Swift.

hourly (our'li), adv. [hour + *-ly*².] Every hour; hour by hour; frequently.

Great was their strife, which hourly was renewed. Dryden, Pal. and Arc., l. 352.

hour-plate (our'plät), n. The plate of a clock or other timepiece on which the hours are marked; the dial.

housesalt, a. [*house*¹ + -al.] Domestic.

Ichnumon (F. I.) The Indian or more properly the Egyptian Rat, Pharoos Mouse, a mortal enemy as to the Crocodile, so to all Serpents, and therefore usually tamed, and made house, by the people of Egypt. Cotgrave.

husbond†, n. An obsolete form of husband.

housbondry†, n. An obsolete form of husbandry.

house (hous), n.; pl. houses (hou'zez). [ME. hous, hous, hus, < AS. hūs = OS. OFries. hūs = D. huis = MLG. hūs = OHG. Hūs, G. haus = Icel. hús = Dan. Sv. hus = Goth. hūs (only in comp. gud-hūs, house of God, temple); prob. connected with hut and *hoard*¹, and ult. from the root of *hide*¹, cover, conceal: see *hide*¹, hut, *hoard*¹.] 1. A building designed to be used as a place of residence, or of human occupation for any purpose: as, a dwelling-house; a banking-house; a house of worship; a public house. In law the word house, used for a dwelling place, is sometimes interpreted as excluding and sometimes as including outbuildings.

It is right a feir Houses, and it is alle round, and highe, and covered with Lead, and it is well paved with white Marble. Mandeville, Travels, p. 81.

I rode to Papia or Pavia, a cite and universite, ther Iyes Seynt Austyn, the grett Doctor, in a house of Religion, of Chanons reguler, and fryers Austyns.

Torkington, Diarie of Eng. Travell, p. 5.

He is for this bonnie lass,
To keep his house in order.

Catherine Johnstone (Child's Ballads, IV. 34).

Houses are built to live in, and not to look on; therefore, let use be preferred before uniformity, except where both may be had. Bacon, Building (ed. 1887).

Hence—2. An abiding-place; an abode; a place or means of lodgment; a fixed shelter or investment: as, the hermit-crab carries its house on its back.

I know that thou wilt bring me to death, and to the house appointed for all living. Job xxx. 23.

It is the curse of kings to be attended

By slaves that take their humours for a warrant

To break within the bloody house of life.

Shak., K. John, iv. 2.

According to M. Fol, who has studied the formation of the house (the mucilaginous cuticular investment) with great care, the Appendicularia have no proper test, and what I have described as the structureless gelatinous investment of the anterior part of the body is the commencement of the house. It increases, assumes a peculiar fibrous structure, and in the course of an hour, in a vigorous animal, it is separated as an envelope in which the whole body is capable of free movement.

Huxley, Anat. Invert., p. 614.

3. A building used for some purpose other than human occupation: usually with a descriptive prefix: as, a cow-house; a warehouse; a tool-house.

And of all thynges let the buttrye, the celler, the kythyn, the larder house, with all other houses of offyces, be kepte cleane. Babes Book (E. E. T. S.), p. 114.

4. The persons collectively who dwell together under one roof; a family; a household.

As for me and my house, we will serve the Lord.

Josh. xxiv. 15.

My mother weeping, my father wailing, . . . and all our house in a great perplexity. Shak., T. G. of V., ii. 3.

5. A family regarded as consisting of ancestors, descendants, and kindred; a race of persons from one stock; a tribe; especially, a noble family or an illustrious race: as, the house of Hapsburg; the house of Hanover; the house of Israel or of Judah.

A patrician,

A man, I must confess, of no mean house.

B. Jonson, Catiline, iv. 2.

The coat-armour of every house was a precious inheritance, which descended, under definite limitations and with distinct differences, to every member of the family.

Stubbs, Const. Hist., § 471.

6. A legislative body; usually, one of the divisions of the legislative branch of a government acting separately, or of any deliberative body divided into two chambers: as, the House of Lords or of Commons in the British Parliament; the House of Representatives in the United States Congress; the House of Bishops and the House of Delegates in the American Episcopal Church. The less numerous or higher in rank of the two bodies composing a bicameral legislature is commonly spoken of, though not officially designated, as the upper house, the other as the lower house. (b) [cap.] Specifically, in the United States, the lower house, or House of Representatives, the more numerous of the two bodies of the national legislature. The name is also given in some States to the corresponding body in the State legislature. See congress, 4.

The House, in addition to its legislative powers, has the sole power of impeachment. Cathoun, Works, I. 176.

7. The audience or attendance at a place of entertainment.

The self-complacent actor, when he views (Stealing a sidelong glance at a full house)
The slope of faces from the floor to roof
Relax'd into a universal grin.

Cowper, Task, iv. 201.

The whole house broke out into acclamations.
F. A. Kemble, Records of a Girlhood, Jan. 9, 1831.

8. In com., a firm or commercial establishment: as, the house of Jones Brothers.

Many a year went round before I was a partner in the house.
Dickens, Great Expectations, lviii.

9. Chamber; room; specifically, in provincial English use, the ordinary sitting-room in a farm-house; in sulphuric-acid works, one of the chambers in which the acid is formed.

Like a pestilence, it doth infect
The houses of the brain.

B. Jonson, Every Man in his Humour, ii. 1.

10. In astrol., a twelfth part of the heavens as divided by great circles drawn through the north and south points of the horizon, in the same way as meridians pass through the earth's poles. The heavens, visible and invisible, excluding the parts that never rise and that never set, were thus divided into twelve parts, six being above the horizon and six below. But there was considerable diversity in the details of the rule for dividing the heavens into houses. They are of different relative magnitudes, according to the different rules which were used for finding their limits. The twelve houses were numbered round from east to south, and so on, beginning with that which lay in the east immediately below the horizon. The first house was called the house of life; the second, that of fortune or riches; the third, that of brethren; the fourth, that of relations; the fifth, that of children; the sixth, that of health; the seventh, that of marriage; the eighth, that of death or the upper portal; the ninth, that of religion; the tenth, that of dignities; the eleventh, that of friends and benefactors; and the twelfth, that of enemies or of captivity. The succeeding houses are the second, fifth, eighth, and eleventh. The cadent houses are the third, sixth, ninth, and twelfth.

Saturn being in the sixth house, in opposition to Mars retrograde in the House of Life, cannot but denote long and dangerous sickness. Scott, Kenilworth, xviii.

11. A square or division on a chess-board.—12. The workhouse; poorhouse. [Colloq.]

We've had Larkins the baker come to inquire if there's parish pay to look for to your bill, Mrs. Armstrong, and I have told him No, not a farthing, not the quarter of a farthing, unless you'll come into the house.

Mrs. Trollope, Michael Armstrong, iv.

house-agent (hous'ā'jēnt), n. One employed in the sale, renting, and care of houses.

house-ball (hous' bāl), n. A boys' game in which a ball is thrown by one player against a house or wall, in order that the second player may strike it with a bat on the rebound.

house-boat (hous' bōt), n. A boat fitted up as a house, and commonly more or less resembling one in form and arrangements, for permanent or temporary habitation. Such boats have long been the only dwellings of many thousands of families in the waters of some eastern countries, intended either to be stationary or to be moved by towing or by oars or sweeps, and in Hindustan and Burma are known as house-boats. They abound even more largely in China; but the boat distinctively called a house-boat there is one for use in excursions or in traveling. The English house-boat is an adaptation of the latter idea, being supplied with all conveniences for living on board as in a house during a prolonged excursion, especially on the Thames.

The ordinary house-boat, as you know, is a great big unwieldy thing, with a square stern; you don't go voyages in her: . . . and you take down your party of friends, and have skylarking.

W. Black, Strange Adventures of a House-Boat, iii.

house-bote (hous' bōt), n. [house + bote, ME. form of boot, payment.] In law, a sufficient allowance of wood to repair the house and supply fuel: a right enjoyed by some tenants on English manors.

house-dog (hous' dog), n. A dog kept to guard a house.

house-dove (hous' dūv), n. One who stays at home.

Then the home-barriers and house-doves that kept Rome still began to repent them that it was not their hap to go with him [Coriolanus].

North, tr. of Plutarch (ed. Skeat), p. 14.

I . . . was not such a house-dove . . . but that I had visited some houses in London.

Greene, Thieves Falling Out (Earl. Misc., VIII. 401).

house-duty (hous' dū' ti), n. In England, a tax imposed on inhabited houses, established about 1695. It was repealed in 1834, but reimposed in place of a window-tax in 1851. Also house-tax.

house-engine (hous' en' jīn), n. A steam-engine which is so constructed as to depend to some extent on the building in which it is contained, and is not independent or portable.

house-factor (hous' fak' tōr), n. Same as house-agent.

housefather (hous' fā' thēr), n. [*house*¹ + father; after G. hausvater = D. huysvader = Icel. húsfadhir = Dan. Sw. husfader.] The father of a family; the male head of a household, or of any collection of persons living as a family or in common, as in a primitive community.

He was dozing, after the fashion of honest housefathers.
Thackeray, Virginians, xxxii.

The simple minds of uncultured men unhesitatingly believed that the spirit of the departed House Father hovered round the place he loved in life.

W. E. Hearn, Aryan Household, p. 93.

house-finch (hous' fīnch), n. See *finch*¹.

house-flag (hous' flag), n. The distinguishing flag of a shipping or other business house or firm; the flag of the house to which a ship belongs.

[I] turned my eyes sloft where the house-flag, dwarfed by height, was rattling like a peal of musketry at the main-roar-masthead.
W. C. Russell, Jack's Courtship, xx.

house-fly (hous' fī), n. [= D. huisvlieg = Dan. husflue = Sw. husflug.] The common fly, Musca domestica. It is a dipterous or two-winged insect, of the family Muscidae and the order Diptera, of the suborder Brachymera (having short feelers or antennæ), and of the subdivision Dichæta (having the sucker or proboscis composed of only two pieces). It is a good representative of the large family Muscidae, and indeed of the whole order Diptera. It is found in nearly all parts of the world. It lays its eggs in bunches or clusters in almost any kind of decaying animal or vegetable matter, as carrion, manure, and other filth, and the maggots hatch in a day or less, according to the degree of heat (of decomposition) to which they are subjected. The larvæ are small, headless, legless maggots, which attain their full size in about two weeks, and then crawl into some dry place to pupate. This process occupies a week or two, and on its completion the perfect fly emerges from the pupa. The house-fly is furnished with a suctorial proboscis, from which, when feeding on any dry substance, it exudes a liquid; this, by moistening the food, fits it to be sucked. Its feet are beset with hairs, each terminating in a disk which is supposed to act as a sucker, enabling it to walk on smooth surfaces, even with its back down, as on a ceiling. These disks are supposed to exude a liquid, making the adhesion more perfect. See also out of compound eye, under eye.

houseful (hous' fūl), n. [*house*¹ + -ful.] A full complement for a house; as much or as many as a house will hold or accommodate, or as it requires; as, a houseful of goods, of furniture, or of people.

There was a world of dressmakers to see, and a world of shopping to do, and a houseful of servants to manage.

C. D. Warner, Backlog Studies, p. 277.

in the general sense of 'herb'; see leek.] The common name of the plants of the genus Sempervivum, natural order Crassulaceae. The common houseleek, S. tectorum, was originally found native in the great mountain-ranges of central and northern Europe to the Caucasus, whence it has spread widely over northern Europe and America, growing on the tops of houses and on walls. It is a succulent herb with very thick, bushy leaves and pink flowers, and is very tenacious of life. It contains malic acid combined with lime. The leaves are applied by the common people to bruises and old ulcers; and it was formerly believed that houseleeks growing on a housetop were a safeguard against lightning. In Scotland it is called four or fouet.

In England it is sometimes called housewort.

Huguenot (hū'ge-not), n. [= Sp. Hugonote = Pg. Hugonote = It. Ugonotto (NL. Hugonotus, A. D. 1562), < F. Huguenot, a Huguenot; prob. ult. < F. Huguenot, a personal name (found as a surname as early as 1387), dim. of Hugo, Hugon, Hugues, < MHG. Hūg, Huc, Hugh, a man's name, < MHG. hugo, OHG. hugu = OS. hugi = AS. hyge, hige, mind, thought: cf. hōgu, care: see howd.] The name as applied to the Protestants of France was first used about 1560, being appar. imported from Geneva, where it appears to have been for some time in use as a political nickname. Its particular origin is unknown; no contemporary information has been found. No person named Huguenot is conspicuous in the history of the Huguenots; but the nickname, if of merely local origin, may have taken its rise from a person so named of whom no record has been preserved. Scheler mentions 16 proposed etymologies, of which 8 rest on the name Hugo or Hugues. One of the others refers the name to the Swiss eidgenot, repr. G. eidgenoss, pl. eidgenossen, confederates, lit. 'oath-fellows,' < eid = E. oath, + genoss, MHG. genōz = AS. genēd, a fellow, companion: see oath and genēd. The F. word was at first used and felt as a term of reproach, prob. because it was regarded as a synonym of Genevan, i. e. 'a foreign (German) heretic.' A member of the Reformed or Calvinistic communion of France in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. The Huguenots were the Puritans of France, noted in general for their austere virtues and the singular purity of their lives. They were persecuted in the reign of Francis I. and his immediate successors, and after 1562 were frequently at war with the Catholics, under the lead of such men as Admiral Coligny and the King of Navarre (afterward Henry IV. of France). In spite of these wars and the massacre of St. Bartholomew, August 24th, 1572, they continued numerous and powerful, and the edict of Nantes, issued by Henry IV. (1598), secured to them full political and civil rights. Their political power was broken after the surrender of La Rochelle in 1628, and the revocation of the edict of Nantes by Louis XIV. (1685) and the subsequent persecutions forced hundreds of thousands into exile to Prussia, the Netherlands, Switzerland, England, etc. Many settled in the colonies of New York, Virginia, etc., but especially in South Carolina. The name is sometimes applied at the present day to the descendants of the original Huguenots.

hullabaloo (hul'ā-ba-lō'), n. [Also written halabaloo, hullaballoo, Sc. hullie-bulloo, hille-bulloo, hullie-bulloo, hille-batoo, hullie-bullie, halloobaloo; a varied redupl. of indefinite elements; cf. hullo = hello, hullo, hubbuboo, and hurry-burry.] Up roar; racket; noisy confusion.

Thinkst thou that we are dying of silence here, and only to be preserved, like the infant Jupiter, by a hullabaloo?
Bulwer, Last Days of Pompeii.

huller (hul'ēr), n. [From *hull*¹ + *-er*¹.] One who or that which hulls; specifically, a hulling-machine; a hulling-mill or huller-gin.

huller-gin (hul'ēr-jin), n. A cotton-gin for ginning cotton gathered with the bolls. E. H. Knight.

hullet (hul'et), n. A dialectal variant of owl.

hull-gull (hul'gul'), n. [Perhaps a corruption of whole gull, with ref. to the closed hand (see goll, fist). Cf. *gull*¹, 7, *hull*⁵.] A guessing game for children. One player takes a number of beans, peas, or the like in his closed hand, saying, "Hull gull." Another says, "Hand full." Then the first says, "Parcel how many?" The other player then guesses at the number, taking all if the guess is correct, otherwise making up the discrepancy.

hulling-machine (hul'ing-ma-shēn'), n. A machine for removing the hulls from grain. In such hulling-machines as the wheat-huller, the barley-mill, and the hominy-mill, the hull is broken and torn from the grain without crushing the grain itself. In the pearl-barley mill, the hull is removed and the grain rounded by grinding. In cotton-cleaning the bolls with the seed and lint are sometimes treated together in the huller-gin. All these hulling-machines, except the last, are essentially grinding-mills, and employ either rotating stones or roughened revolving cylinders.

hullite (hul'it), n. [After Prof. Edward Hull of Dublin.] A black massive mineral filling cavities in basalt near Belfast, Ireland. It is a hydrous silicate of iron, aluminium, and magnesium.

hullo (hu-lō'), interj. Another form of hello.

Hullo! (and here I particularly beg, in parenthesis, that the printer will follow my spelling of the word, and not put Hillo, or Halloo, instead, both of which are base compromises which represent no sound that ever yet issued from any Englishman's lips). Dickens, Household Words.

hullock (hul'ok), n. [Origin obscure.] Naut., a small part of a sail lowered in a gale to keep the ship's head to the sea.

hully¹ (hul'i), a. [From *hull*¹ + *-y*¹.] Having husks or pods; silicious.

hully², n. [Cf. *hull*¹.] 1. A long wicker trap used for catching eels.—2. A perforated chest for keeping crabs and lobsters in the sea till wanted. Halliwell.

Sometimes a thousand twangling instruments
Will hum about mine ears. Shak., Tempest, III. 2.

2. To give utterance to a similar sound, such as the droning of a tune, a contemptuous or vacant mumbling, a murmuring expression of applause or satisfaction, hesitation, dissent, etc.

When Burnet preached, part of his congregation hummed so loudly and so long that he sat down to enjoy it.
Johnson, Bp. Sprat.

3. Same as *hem*².

If you chance to be out, do not confess it with standing still, or humming, or gaping one at another.

B. Jonson, Epicene, v. 1.

"Well, you fellow," says my lord, "what have you to say? Don't stand humming and hawing, but speak out."

Fielcing, Tom Jones, VIII. 11.

To make things hum, to set matters in rapid motion or great activity. [U. S.]

Since the American nation fairly got hold of the holiday [Christmas], . . . we have made it hum, as we like to say.
C. D. Warner, Harper's Mag., LXXVIII. 161.

II. trans. 1. To sing with shut mouth, as to the sound m; murmur without articulation; mumble: as, to hum an air.

Pray, let me look upon the gentleman
With more heed; then I did but hum him over
In haste, good faith, as lawyers chancery sheets.
Beau. and Fl., Wit at Several Weapons, I. 1.
And far below the Roundhead rode
And hummed a surly hymn.
Tennyson, Talking Oak.

2. To express approbation of, or applaud, by humming.

Such Sermons as are most hummed and applauded there would scarce be suffer'd the second hearing in a grave congregation of pious Christians.

Milton, Apology for Smectymnus.

Here Nash, if I may be permitted the use of a polite and fashionable phrase, was hummed.
Goldsmith, Richard Nash.

hum¹ (hum), n. [< hum¹, v.]. 1. Any inarticulate, low, murmuring, or buzzing sound, as that made by bees in flight, by a spinning top, etc.; a faint continuous sound having no definite pitch; a buzz.

In drawing hums the feeble insects grieve.
Addison, tr. of Virgil's Georgics, iv.

Sounds that come
(However near) like a faint distant hum
Out of the grass, from which mysterious birth
We guess the busy secrets of the earth.

Keats, Vox et preterea nihil.

With the hum of swarming bees
Into dreamful slumber lull'd.

Tennyson, Eleanore.

The hum outliving the hushed bell, Lowell, Darkened Mind.

Specifically—(a) A low confused noise, as of a crowd, or of distant voices or sounds of any kind.

From camp to camp, through the fowl womb of night,
The hum of either army stilly sounds.

Shak., Hen. V., iv. (cho.).

Towered cities please us then,
And the busy hum of men.

Milton, L'Allegro, l. 118.

No sound of life is heard, no village hum.
Bryant, Earth.

(b) A buzz or murmur of applause or approbation. (c) A sound uttered with closed mouth by a speaker in a pause from embarrassment, affectation, or the like: as, hums and haws. Also (and now more commonly) hem.

I take my chair,
And, after two or three majestic hums,
... Peruse my writings.

Massinger, Parliament of Love, ii. 1.

My solemn hums and ha's the servants quake at.
Fletcher (and Massinger?), Lovers' Progress, i. 1.

2*t.* [Prob. from its causing a buzzing or humming in the head.] A drink formerly common, probably made of strong ale or of ale and spirit. Its exact composition is not known.

And calls for hum.

You takers of strong waters and tobacco,
Mark this.

Lord, what should I ail!

What a cold I have over my stomach! would I had some hum.

Fletcher, Wildgoose Chase, ii. 3.

Venous hum, in pathol., the humming sound heard in the large veins at the base of the neck, especially in anemic states.

hum¹ (hum), interj. [Another form of hem, h'm, interj., q. v. see *hum*¹, n., esp. in sense 1 (c). Bar. Hum, hum—
Jam. That preface,
If left out in a lawyer, spoils the cause,
Though ne'er so good and honest.

Fletcher, Spanish Curate, iii. 3.

hum² (hum), v. t.; pret. and pp. hummed, ppr. humming. [Orig. dial.; appar. a particular use of *hum*¹, v. t., 2, II, 2; cf. Sp. zumbir, joke, jest, make oneself merry, Pg. zombar, joke, jest, a particular use of Sp. zumbir, Pg. zumbir, hum, buzz: see *hum*¹. Cf. humbug.] To trick or delude; impose on; cajole.

I don't mean to cajole you hither with the expectation of amusement or entertainment; you and I know better than to hum or be hummed in that manner.

Mme. D'Arbly, Diary, II. 153.

hum² (hum), n. [< hum², v.] An imposition or hoax; a humbug.

'Tis true his friend gave out that he was hanged;
But to be sure, 'twas all a hum.

Garrick, quoted in Jon Bee's Samuel Foote, p. lxxxvi.

It's "No Go"—it's "Gammon"—it's "all a Hum."
Barham, Ingoldsby Legends, II. 136.

I daresay all this is hum, and that all will come back.

Lamb, To Manning.

Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err.

3. Having the feelings and inclinations proper to man; having tenderness, compassion, and a disposition to treat other human beings and the lower animals with kindness; kind; benevolent.

It is the humane way: the other course
Will prove too bloody.

Shak., Cor., iii. 1.

From racks, indeed, and from all penalties directed against the persons, the property, and the liberty of heretics, the humane spirit of Mr. Gladstone shrinks with horror.
Macaulay, Gladstone on Church and State.

4. Tending to humanize or refine: applied to the elegant or polite branches of literature, especially philology, rhetoric, poetry, and the study of the ancient classics. See humanity, 5.

He was well skilled in all kinds of humane literature.
Wood, Athens Oxon., I. 810.

It [theology] is too universal in its relations to be able to stand alone; it will disclose its best treasures only to those who come to it cultivated by the study of the humaner letters.
Contemporary Rev., LI. 215.

= Syn. 3. Humane, Merciful; tender, tender-hearted, kind-hearted, compassionate, sympathetic. Humane differs from the ordinary use of merciful in that it expresses active endeavors to find and relieve suffering, and especially to prevent it, while merciful expresses the disposition to spare one the suffering which might be inflicted. The good Samaritan was humane; Shylock should have been merciful; the Royal Humane Society; a merciful judge.

Human, Humane. Human is that which belongs to man as man; humane means not inhuman, compassionate.
A. S. Hill, Rhetoric, p. 51.

And we most humbly beseech thee, O merciful Father, to hear us. Book of Common Prayer, Communion Service, [Invocation].

humanely (hū-mān'li), adv. [< humane + -ly 2. Cf. humanly.] In a humane manner; with kindness, tenderness, or compassion.

Amer. Anthropologist, I. 12.

2. A system or mode of thought in which human interests predominate, or any purely human element is made prominent.

The Hegelian idealism first bred the more sensualistic system of humanism, and then humanism bred socialism.
Rae, Contemporary Socialism, p. 114.

Here we have the stern Puritanism of old Birmingham passing into modern nonconformity, . . . and this milder form of the old spirit mellowing at last into nineteenth-century humanism.
Nineteenth Century, XX. 246.

I neither admit the moral influence of theism in the past, nor look forward to the moral influence of humanism in the future.
W. K. Clifford, Lectures, II. 249.

3. The subjects of study called the humanities; hence, polite learning in general; literary culture; especially, in the revival of learning in the middle ages, the intelligent and appreciative study of Latin, Greek, and Hebrew letters, which was introduced by Petrarch in Italy, and spread thence throughout Europe.

humanist (hū'man-ist), n. and a. [= F. humaniste = Sp. Pg. humanista = It. umanista; as human + -ist.] I. n. 1. One accomplished in literary and classical culture; especially, in the fourteenth, fifteenth, and sixteenth centuries, one of the scholars who, following the impulse of Petrarch, pursued and disseminated the study and a truer understanding of classical, and particularly of Greek, literature. The active enthusiasm of the humanists was the chief factor in accomplishing the Renaissance.

The author of Utopia was known for tolerant and liberal: he was a humanist and a reformer.

R. W. Dixon, Hist. Church of Eng., j.

Among the men of letters were many of the most eminent humanists, such as Leonardo Bruni Aretino, scholar and statesman, born in 1369.

C. E. Norton, Church-building in Middle Ages, p. 252.

He [Hermann Lotze] is now one of the noblest living humanists, as contrasted with the specialist on the one hand, and with the eclectic . . . on the other.

G. S. Hall, German Culture, p. 94.

2. A student of human nature, or of matters of human interest; one versed in human affairs and relations.

Equally pleased with a watch, a coach, . . . or a fact in hydrostatics, Pepsys was pleased yet more by the beauty, the worth, the mirth, or the mere scenic attitude in life of his fellow-creatures. He shows himself throughout a sterling humanist.
R. L. Stevenson, Samuel Pepsys.

II. a. Humanistic.

Italy, that holy land of Humanist enthusiasm.
Encyc. Brit., XII. 412.

humanistic (hū-mā-nis'tik), a. [< humanist + -ic.] Of or pertaining to humanity or the humanities; characteristic of humanists or of humanism.

No mystic dreams of ascetic piety had come to trouble the tranquillity of its humanistic devotion.
J. Caird.

Science . . . substitutes a world of force and law for a world of humanistic divinities.
Pop. Sci. Mo., XXX. 148.

The old Plutonic gods do not assert themselves; they are buried and turned to dust, and the more modern humanistic divinities bear sway.

J. Burroughs, The Century, XXVII. 113.

humanistically (hū-mā-nis'ti-kal-i), adv. In a humane manner; by means of the humanities.

Apart from current controversies stood the teachings of the school of Chartres, humanistically nourished on the study of the ancients.
A. Seth, Encyc. Brit., XXI. 423.

humanitarian (hū-mā-ni-tā'ri-an), a. and n. [< humanity + -arian.] I. a. 1. In theol., affirming the humanity or human nature of Christ, but denying his divinity.—2. Having regard to the interests of humanity, or all mankind; broadly philanthropic.

Humanitarian, wider of scope than philanthropic, is a word pregnant with significance.

F. Hall, Mod. Eng., p. 316.

II. n. 1. In theol.: (a) One who asserts the mere humanity of Jesus Christ, and denies his divinity; a Unitarian. Some humanitarians hold that Christ was the subject of a divine inspiration which rendered his human nature an extraordinary one. (b) One who maintains the perfectibility of human nature without the aid of grace.—2. One who adopts the doctrine or theory that man's sphere of duty is limited to a benevolent interest in and practical promotion of the welfare of the human race, apart from all considerations of religion.—3. A philanthropist.

humanitarianism (hū'mān-i-tā'ri-ān-izm), n. [humanitarian + -ism]. 1. In theol., the doctrine that Jesus Christ possessed a human nature only.—2. The doctrine that mankind may become perfect without divine aid.—3. The doctrine that benevolence or philanthropy forms the sum of man's duties.

Pierre Leroux, who at a later period became the exponent of Humanitarianism, a kind of Saint-Simonism modified and tinted with Hegelian philosophy.

R. T. Ely, French and German Socialism, p. 72.

4. Humane or humanitarian principles; comprehensive humanism or philanthropy.

Christianity, by reason of the simplicity of its doctrines, the sublime humanitarianism of its ethics.

J. Owen, Evenings with Skeptics, II. 58.

Humanitarianism aims at the reorganization of society, so that all shall possess equal advantages for gaining a livelihood and contributing to the welfare of society.

L. F. Ward, Dynam. Sociol., II. 450.

humanitarian (hū'mā-nish'an), n. [Irreg. < humanity + -ian]. A humanist.

There was an orator there, a man of great reading, a singular scholar, and an excellent humanitarian.

Holland, tr. of Plutarch, p. 588.

Nay, sir, I have read history, I am a little humanitarian.

B. Jonson, Cynthia's Revels, iii. 3.

humanity (hū'mān-i'ti), n. [ME. humanite, < OF. humanite, humaneite, < F. humanité = Pr. humanitat = Sp. humanidad = Pg. humanidade = It. umanità = D. humaniteit = G. humanität = Dan. Sw. humanitet, < L. humanitas (-s), human nature, humanity, also humane conduct, < humanus, human, humane: see human, humane]. 1. The condition or quality of being human; human character or nature.

The nature and condition of man, wherein he is less than God Almighty, and excellency not withstanding all other creatures in earth, is called humanity.

Sir T. Elyot, The Governour, ii. 8.

There is no such thing as stereotyped humanity; it must ever be a vague, bodiless idea, because the concrete units from which it is formed are independent realities.

J. H. Newman, Gram. of Assent, p. 268.

In the deluge, Fintan escaped by taking the form of a salmon, until the receding waters left him high and dry on Tara Hill, when he resumed his humanity.

W. S. Gregg, Irish Hist. for Eng. Readers, p. 4.

2. Mankind collectively; the human race.

Humanity must perforce prey on itself, Like monsters of the deep.

Shak., Lear, iv. 2.

It was cutting very close to the bone to carve such a shred of humanity from the body politic to make a soldier of.

O. W. Holmes, Old Vol. of Life, p. 61.

3. The character of being humane; consideration for the sensibilities of others, and sympathy with their needs or suffering; kindness; benevolence; a disposition to relieve distress, whether of men or of animals, and to treat all creatures kindly.

To withdraw something from thyself to give to other—that is a point of humanity and gentleness, which never taketh away so much commodity as it bringeth again.

Sir T. More, Utopia (tr. by Robinson), ii. 7.

Are you angry, sir,

Because you are entertain'd with all humanity?

Freely and nobly us'd?

Beau. and Fl., Custom of the Country, iii. 2.

The notion of what, for want of a better phrase, I must call a moral brotherhood in the whole human race has been steadily gaining ground during the whole course of history, and we have now a large abstract term answering to this notion—Humanity.

Maine, Early Hist. of Institutions, p. 64.

4†. Politeness; civility.

To prate in thy maysters presence, it is no humanity.

Babees Book (E. E. T. S.), p. 86.

There cannot be a greater argument of the general good understanding of a people than a sudden consent to give their approbation of a sentiment which has no emotion in it. If it were spoken with never so great skill in the actor, the manner of uttering that sentence could have nothing in it which could strike any but people of the greatest humanity—nay, people elegant and skilful in observations upon it.

Steele, Spectator, No. 502.

5. Learning or literature of a merely human or secular kind: opposed to divinity: generally in the plural, with reference to the several branches of such literature, as philology, grammar, rhetoric, poetry, the study of the ancient classics, and the like. In Scotland, in the singular, applied to Latin and Latin literature alone: as, a professor of humanity.

Philological studies, when philology . . . was restricted to the cultivation of the languages, literature, history, and archaeology of Greece and Rome, were very commonly called litera humaniores, or, in English, the humanities; and it is the conviction of their value as a moral and intellectual discipline which has led scholars almost universally to ascribe the origin of this appellation to a sense of their refining, elevating, and humanizing influence. This, however, I think is an erroneous etymology. They were called litera humaniores, the humanities, by way of opposition to the litera divina, or divinity, the two studies, philology and theology, then completing the circle of scholastic knowledge which, at the period of the introduction of the phrase, scarcely included any branch of physical science. G. P. Marsh, Lects. on Eng. Lang., iii.

the shoulder, = Skt. ansa, the shoulder.] 1. In anat.: (a) The bone of the upper arm, extending from the shoulder-joint to the elbow-joint. In all the higher vertebrates it is a single bone, usually of much greater length than thickness, and more or less cylindrical, but in a few cases short and stout and very irregular. It articulates above with the scapula, or scapula and coracoid, by a convex head; below by its condyles with the bones of the forearm. It is remarkably slender and cylindrical in man, and still more so in bats. See cut under epicondyle. (b) The proscapula of fishes: so called by Cuvier and his followers. (c) The mesocoracoid of fishes: so designated by Owen and others. (d) The shoulder or upper arm and associated parts.—2. In entom.: (a) The femur of the fore leg; the brachium. Kirby and Spence. (b) The subcostal or submarginal vein of the fore wing of certain hymenoptera. Walker. (c) The front corner of the thoracic region seen from above; the shoulder: this may be the prothorax, as in Coleoptera, or the mesothorax, as in Diptera.—Anconal fossa of the humerus. See anconal.

humet, humetel (hū-met'), n. [Origin obscure.] In her., a fesse or bar couped or cut off short at each end, and so forming a simple rectangle with its longer sides horizontal.

humeté, humetté, humettes (hū-mē-tā', -tē'), a. In her., couped at each end or arm, so that the extremities do not reach the sides of the escutcheon: applied to the chevron, fesse, cross, and the like.

humette (hū-met'), n. A cap of fence worn by archers and other infantry soldiers in the fifteenth century.

humgruffin (hum'gruf-in), n. [A made word, based on hum, v. i., + gruff, mixed with griffin.] A terrible or repulsive person. [Humorous.]

All shrunk from the glance of that keen-flashing eye, Save one horrid Humgruffin, who seem'd by his talk, And the airs he assumed, to be cock of the walk. Barham, Ingoldsby Legends, II. 198.

humhum (hum'hum), n. [E. Ind.] A kind of plain, coarse Indian cloth, made of cotton.

Humian (hū-mi-an), a. Of or pertaining to David Hume (1711-76), a Scottish philosopher and historian, or to his philosophy or writings. Hume carried sensationalism and individualism to their extreme consequences, resulting in philosophical skepticism. The study of Hume roused Kant to the production of his "Critique of the Pure Reason," which is largely a refutation of Hume's skepticism.

The principal effort of the Humian school has been to abrogate relations not only from the sphere of reality, but from the sphere of consciousness. W. James, Mind, IX. 4.

The Humian theory was believed to lead inevitably to scepticism and infidelity. Encyc. Brit., IV. 387.

humic (hū-mik), a. [< humus + -ic.] Pertaining to or derived from mold (humus).—Humic acid, an acid found in humus, or formed from it by boiling with an alkali. Its salts are called humates.

humication (hū-mi-kū-bā'shon), n. [< L. humus, the ground, hum, on the ground, + uatio (n.), a lying down, < cubare, lie down.] A lying on the ground; penitential prostration.

Fasting and sackcloth, and ashes and tears, and humications, used to be companions of repentance. Abp. Bramhall.

Lents, Embers, Vigils, Groans, Humications. J. Beaumont, Psyche, v. 148.

humid (hū-mid), a. [< F. humide = Pr. humid = Sp. húmedo = Pg. húmedo = It. umido, < L. humidus, correctly umidus, moist, < humere, correctly umere, be moist, akin to uens, moist, avidus, uidus, moist: cf. Gr. ὑγρός, moist (see hygro).] Icel. vökr, moist, > E. dial. wokey, moist, ME. woken, be moist. Hence humor, etc.] Moist, or accompanied with moisture; containing, or formed or affected by, water or vapor; wet or watery; damp.

On which the sun more glad impress'd his beams Than in fair evening cloud, or humid bow. Milton, P. L., iv. 151.

Fearless of humid air and gathering rains, Forth steps the man. Couper, Task, i. 212.

Humid process. See assaying. = Syn. Damp, Dank, etc. See moist.

humidify (hū-mid'i-fī), v. t.; pret. and pp. humidified, ppr. humidifying. [< humid + -fy.] To make humid. [Rare.]

Humidifying the air in mills. The Engineer, LXV. 853.

humidity (hū-mid'i-tī), n. [< ME. humiditee, < OF. humidité, F. humidité = Pr. humiditat = Sp. humididad (cf. Pg. humidade) = It. umidità, < L. humiditas (t-s), correctly umiditas (t-s), moisture, < umidus, moist: see humid.] 1. The state of being humid; moisture; dampness; especially, a moderate degree of wetness which is perceptible to the eye or touch.

Till it be harde, unwatred must it be, Lest alle the werk corrupte humydites. Palladius, Husbandrie (E. E. T. S.), p. 183.

O blessed breeding sun, draw from the earth Rotten humidity. Shak., T. of A., iv. 3.

2. In meteor., the amount of aqueous vapor in the atmosphere compared with that which is required to saturate it under the given condition as to temperature: specifically called relative humidity. If the atmosphere is completely saturated, the humidity is expressed as 100; if perfectly dry, as 0. The humidity varies widely in different places, and in the same place at different times.

humidness (hū-mid-nes), n. Humidity. humifuse (hū-mi-fus), a. [= F. humifuse, < L. humus, the ground, hum, on the ground, + fusus, pour or spread out, in pot. of fundere, pour: see fusel and found.] In bot., spread over the surface of the ground; procumbent: as, a humifuse plant.

humilet, a. [< L. humilis, low, humble: see humble, the older form.] Lowly; humble.

humilet, v. t. [< humile, a. Cf. humiliate, humble, v.] To humble.

Davyd ought to humyle himselfe. Bp. Fisher.

humiliant (hū-mil'i-ant), a. [= F. humiliant = Sp. humillante = Pg. humiliante = It. umiliante, < LL. humilian (t-s), ppr. of humiliare, humiliate: see humiliate.] Humiliating. [Rare.]

The melancholy of humiliating thoughts. Mrs. Browning, Drama of Exile.

humiliate (hū-mil'i-āt), v. t.; pret. and pp. humiliated, ppr. humiliating. [< LL. humiliatus, ppr. of humiliare (> It. umiliare = Sp. humillar = Pg. humilhar = Pr. humiliar, umiliar, omiliar = F. humilier), abase, humble, < L. humilis, lowly, humble: see humble.] To cause to be or appear lower or more humble; depress; especially, to abase in estimation; subject to shame or disgrace; mortify: as, to humiliate one's self by a confession; to humiliate a boaster.

We stand humiliated rather than encouraged. Arnold. = Syn. Debase, Degrade, etc. (see abase); mortify, shame, put to shame, put down, dishonor.

humiliating (hū-mil'i-ā-ing), p. a. [Ppr. of humiliate, v.] Humbling; depressing or bating pride; mortifying.

The citizens of Madrid have more than once besieged their sovereign in his own palace, and extorted from him the most humiliating concessions.

Macaulay, Machiavelli.

This humiliating peace of Presburg, by which Austria lost 23,000 square miles of territory and almost 3,000,000 of inhabitants, was a prelude to the complete overthrow of the German empire.

Woolsey, Intro. to Inter. Law, App. II., p. 401.

humiliation (hū-mil-i-ā'shon), n. [= F. humiliation = Pr. humiliatio = Sp. humillacion = Pg. humillação = It. umiliazione, < LL. humilitatio (n.), < humiliare, humiliate: see humiliate.] The act of humiliating or humbling, or the state of being humiliated; abasement; mortification.

The former was an humiliation of Deity: the latter an humiliation of manhood. Hooker, Eccles. Polity.

The miseries and humiliations of dependence . . . had not broken the spirit of Machiavelli.

Macaulay, Machiavelli.

Note the humiliation he suffers from being looked down upon as of no account amongst men.

H. Spencer, Social Statics, p. 250.

humility (hū-mil'i-tī), n.; pl. humilities (-tiz). [< ME. humilite, < OF. humilité, F. humilité = Pr. humilitat, omilitat = Sp. humilldad = Pg. humidade = It. umiltà, < L. humilitas (t-s), lowness, meanness, baseness, in LL. (eccl.) humilit, < humilis, low, lowly, humble: see humble.] 1. The state or character of being humble; freedom from pride and arrogance; lowliness of mind; a low estimate of one's self; self-abasement.

The fear of the Lord is the instruction of wisdom; and before honour is humility. Prov. xv. 33.

Serving the Lord with all humility of mind, and with many tears. Acts xx. 19.

Owe not thy humility unto humiliation from adversity. Sir T. Browne, Christ. Mor., i. 14.

It is the mark of nobleness to volunteer the lowest service, the greatest spirit only attaining to humility. Emerson, Civilization.

2†. An act of submission. With these humilities they satisfied the young king. Sir J. Davies.

3. A name of several different tattlers or totanin birds of the family Scolopacidae. (a) The semipalmated tattler or willet, Symphemia semipalmata. (Massachusetts.) (b) The greater yellowlegs, Totanus melanoleucus. Audubon. (Maine.) (c) The Bartramian sandpiper. Trumbull. (Long Island, New York.) (d) The Hudsonian godwit, Limosa harricana. (Local, U. Between h and gt or lt is the anatomical neck of the bone; a little below b is the surgical neck of the bone.

hummin (hū'min), n. [< humus + -in².] A neutral indifferent substance said by Mulder to exist in black humus. It may also be prepared from sugar or starch by the action of a mineral acid. Its composition and properties have not as yet been fully investigated.

Humiria (hū-mir-i-ä), n. [NL., < humiri, umiri, the native name in Guiana and Brazil.] A genus of balsamiferous shrubs or trees, of the natural order Humiriaceae, founded by Aublet in 1775. It is characterized by having 20 stamens, which are united by their base, and either all entire and bearing 3 anthers, or with 5 larger, 3-cleft at the apex, and bearing 1 anther; the disk is 10-lobed or 10-parted; the leaves are alternate, simple, entire or crenulate; and the flowers are white and arranged in cymes. Thirteen species are known, all natives of Guiana and Brazil. H. balsamifera of Guiana is a tree 40 feet high, having a reddish wood used in house-building; the bark when wounded yields a reddish balsamic juice, which is burned as a perfume when dry, and is also used in the preparation of an ointment. H. floribunda of Brazil is a small tree called umiri. Its bark is greatly esteemed by the Brazilians as a perfume, and when wounded yields a delightfully fragrant yellow balsam known as balsam of umiri.

Humiriaceae (hū-mir-i-ä'sē-ä), n. pl. [NL., < Humiria + -aceae.] A small natural order of dicotyledonous polypetalous plants, typified by the genus Humiria. The species are, with one exception, tropical South American trees or shrubs, abounding in a resinous juice. They are characterized by having regular hermaphrodite flowers, with 5 small imbricate sepals and 5 hypogynous deciduous petals, 10 or many hypogynous monadelphous stamens, and a 5-celled ovary. The fruit is a drupe, with albuminous seed and orthotrope embryo.

Humism (hū'mizim), n. [< Hume (see def.) + -ism.] The philosophical doctrines of David Hume. See Humian.

Yet Berkeley in certain passages verges toward Humism, as, for example, where he says: "The very existence of ideas constitutes the soul. Mind is a congeries of perceptions. Take away perceptions, and you take away mind. Put the perceptions, and you put the mind."

Bibliotheca Sacra, XLV. 86.

humite (hū'mit), n. [Named after Sir Abraham Hume.] Originally, a mineral from Vesuvius, occurring in small crystals yellow to brown in color, and belonging, as was believed, to three types of crystalline form. It was regarded as identical with chondrodite. At present, these three varieties are accepted as distinct species or subspecies, and are called humite, chondrodite, and clino-humite. The name humite includes only the kind crystallizing in the orthorhombic system; the other two are monoclinic, but differ in angles and planes. They have all nearly the same chemical composition, being fluosilicates of magnesium and iron. See chondrodite.

humlet, a. An obsolete form of humble².

humme (hum'el), v. and a. See humble².

hummer (hum'el-er), n. [< hummel + -er¹.] One who or that which humbles; specifically, an instrument or machine for separating the awns of barley from the seed.

humming-machine (hum'el-ing-mā-shēn'), n. A machine for breaking off the awns of barley. It consists of a vertical shaft provided with several beaters at several different levels and revolving rapidly in a cylindrical case, so as to beat the grain as it falls. E. H. Knight.

hummer (hum'ēr), n. [< hum + -er¹.] 1. One who or that which hums.

Loved of bee—the tawny hummer.

Emerson, To Ellen.

Denizens of water and marsh sent forth their voices, jerky and out of accord with the united buzz of the hosts of field and wood hummers. Harper's Mag., LXXVIII. 48.

2. One who or that which excels in any quality, especially in general energy or speed. [Slang.] —3. In ornith., a humming-bird. —Attic hummer. See Attic. —Helmet hummer, any bird of the subgenus Calypte.

humme (hum'i), n. [Cf. hump, hummock.] A small protuberance. See the quotation, and hump, n., 2. Jamieson.

A growth on the back of the neck called a humme, the result of long friction, is needful to enable a man to balance a plank [in discharging cargoes] with any degree of comfort. Nineteenth Century, XXII. 486.

humming (hum'ing), n. [Verbal n. of hum¹, v.] A sound like that made by bees; a low murmuring sound.

Good man, he's troubled with matter of more moment; Hummings of higher nature vex his brains, sir.

Fletcher, Pilgrim, i. 2.

The musical accents of the Indians to us are but inarticulate hummings. Glanville.

humming (hum'ing), p. a. [Ppr. of hum¹, v.] 1. Resounding with hums.

And many a rose-carnation feed

With summer spice the humming air.

Tennyson, In Memoriam, cl.

2. Such as to bubble or froth much, or as to cause a humming in the head: applied to strong malt liquors.

They presently feth'd in a brace of fat does, With humming strong liquor likewise. Robin Hood and Little John (Child's Ballads, V. 231).

A glass of wine or humming beer, The heart and spirit for to cheer.

Poor Robin (1735).

humming-bird (hum'ing-bērd), n. A bird whose wings, by their rapid vibration, make a humming sound; any bird of the family Trochilidae. Humming-birds are the most brilliant as well as the smallest of birds, averaging under 3 inches in length, including the bill, which is relatively long and slender, and usually straight, but sometimes decurved or recurved. The tongue is slender and extensile, and constructed like a double-barreled tube; it is used, like the haustellum of an insect, to suck the sweets of flowers. The birds, however, also eat insects. They build a nest, generally like a little cup, coated outside with lichens, and lined with gossamer, plant-down, and other delicate fibers. The eggs are always two in number, and pure white. The wings are narrow and acute or falcate, and so rapidly vibrated as to become indistinct to view; the flight is very swift. The feet are very small and fitted only for perching, not for progression.

The tail is of every shape, and sometimes longer than the rest of the bird. A few of the humming-birds are dull-colored, but most of them glitter with the most exquisite hues of iridescent quality or metallic luster, changing in different lights. Shining grass-green is the most frequent color, but many other tints are found, as purple, violet, steel-blue, golden green, crimson, and various shades of fiery red, particularly about the head, where many species are also ornamented with crests, ruffs, and gorgets not less elegant in form than in color. All the humming-birds are confined to America, extending from Alaska to Patagonia, and they are especially numerous between the tropics. The latest critical authority on the subject describes 426 species, of 125 genera. About 16 genera are known to occur in the United States. The commonest of these, and the only one known east of the Mississippi, is the rubythroat, Trochilus colubris. The northernmost is the rufous or Nootka Sound hummer, Selasphorus rufus. The largest in the United States is Eugenes fulgens, about 4 inches long. Amazilia fusicaudata is a rather large one. The plants among them all reach a length, bill included, of about 7 inches. Also called hum-bird and hummer.

Yet by some object every brain is stirr'd: The dull may waken to a humming-bird.

Pope, Dunciad, iv. 446.

Humming-bird bush, a small leguminous shrub, Eschynomene Monticola, of South America; so called because the humming-birds are specially fond of visiting its flowers.

—Humming-bird hawk-moth. See hawk-moth.

hummock (hum'ok), n. [Also written hummock and hammock; perhaps an assimilated form of hummock*, dim. of hump (like hillock, dim. of hill); cf. LG. hūmpel, a little heap or mound: see hump. Cf. humme.] 1. A low elevation, hillock, or knoll. The word was much used by the early navigators to designate a rounded mass of land seen in the distance. It is now chiefly applied—(a) to the protuberances on the surface of a mass of rough ice, particularly in high latitudes; (b) to the hillocks or more or less solid spots rising above the general level of a swamp or of marshy land. Hummocks, or islets as they are sometimes called, constitute a marked feature of the swamps and savannas of the southern Atlantic States, and are often covered with dense forest-growth.

Along a flat, level country, over delightful green savannas, decorated with hummocks or islets of dark groves consisting of Magnolia grandiflora.

Bartram, Travels through North and South Carolina, etc. (London, 1792), p. 219.

A hummock is a protuberance raised upon any plane of ice above the common level. . . . To hummocks, principally, the ice is indebted for its variety of fanciful shapes, and its picturesque appearance.

Scoresby, Account of Arctic Regions (Edin., 1820), I. 226.

I have penetrated to those meadows on the morning of many a first spring day, jumping from hummock to hummock, from willow-root to willow-root.

Thoreau, Walden, p. 339.

2. (a) The form of the hand when the fingers are joined and bent in an even line, or bunched with the end of the thumb: as, to mak' a hummock. (b) As much of any loose material as can be taken up in the hand with the fingers so bent: as, a hummock of meal. [Scotch.]

hummocked (hum'okt), a. [< hummock + -ed².] Resembling a hummock; exhibiting or characterized by hummocks.

The hills [of Iceland] are in long hummocked masses. Miss Oswald.

hummocky (hum'ok-i), a. [< hummock + -y¹.] Abounding in or full of hummocks.

Ice . . . so hummocky that sledding over it would be impracticable. C. F. Hall, Polaris Expedition, p. 141.

humor, n. See hammam.

humor, humour (hū' or ū'mōr), n. [< ME. humour, humor, in the old med. sense, also (after L.) moisture, < OF. humeur, later humeur, F. humeur, moisture, sap, juice, wet, = Pr. humor, ymor, ymor = *Sp. Palladius, Husbandrie (R. E. T. S.), p. 150.

Is it physical

To walk unbraced, and suck up the humours Of the dank morning? Shak., J. C. ii. 1.

2. An animal fluid, whether natural or morbid; now, especially, any of the thinner bodily fluids, limpid, serous, or sanious, as the constituent fluids or semi-fluids of the eye, or the watery matter in some cutaneous eruptions. The four cardinal humors of ancient physicians were the blood, choler (yellow bile), phlegm, and melancholy (black bile), regarded by them as determining, by their conditions and proportions, a person's physical and mental qualities and disposition. See temperament.

Mens bodies be not more full of ill humors than common milke myndes . . . be full of fancies, opinions, errors, and faults. Aecham, The Scholemaster, p. 115.

Emil.

Is he not jealous?

Des. Who, he? I think the sun, where he was born, Drew all such humours from him. Shak., Othello, iii. 4.

Good Blood causeth good Humours.

Howell, Letters, ii. 54.

Hence—3. One's special condition of mind or quality of feeling; peculiarity of disposition, permanent or temporary; mental state; mood: as, a surly humor; a strange humor.

Therefore as one lackynge the quaye humure of deucion, I cannot long contynue in prayer.

Page. Sir Hugh is there, is he?

Host. He is there: see what humour he is in.

Shak., M. W. of W., ii. 8.

The French Nation value themselves upon Civility, and build and dress mostly for Figure: This Humour makes the Curiosity of Strangers very easie and welcome to them.

Lister, Journey to Paris, p. 2.

Specifically—(a) Disposition, especially a capricious disposition; freak; whim; vagary; oddness of mood or manners: in this sense very fashionable in the time of Shakspeare.

Cob, What is that humour? some rare thing, I warrant.

Cash. It is a gentleman-like monster, bred in the special gallantry of our time, by affectation, and fed by folly.

B. Jonson, Every Man in his Humour, iii. 2.

Give me leave to tell you that there is one Frailty, or rather ill-favoured Custom, that reigns in you, which weighs much; it is a Humour of swearing in all your Discourses.

Howell, Letters, I. v. 11.

Not thinking my self very safe, indeed, under a Man whose humours were so brutish and barbarous.

Dampier, Voyages, I. 518.

The ambiguity of the term [humour] has confounded it with humor itself: they are, however, so far distinct, that a humour—that is, some absorbing singularity in a character—may not necessarily be very humorous; it may be only absurd.

I. D'Israeli, Amen. of Lit., II. 241.

The village-folk, with all their humours quaint.

Whittier, Tl. Countess.

(b) A facetious or jocular turn of mind, as in conversation; the disposition to find, or the faculty of finding, ludicrous aspects or suggestions in common facts or notions.

To entertain an audience perpetually with humour is to carry them from the conversation of gentlemen, and treat them with the follies and extravagancies of Bedlam.

Dryden, Mock Astrologer, Pref.

The ancients, indeed, appear not to have possessed that comic quality that we understand as humour, nor can I discover a word which exactly corresponds with our term humour in any language, ancient or modern.

I. D'Israeli, Lit. Char., p. 434.

Humour . . . is counted something elegant and loving.

A. Bain, Emotions and Will, p. 249.

(c) In lit., witty, droll, or jocular imagination, conspicuous in thought and expression, and tending to excite amusement; that quality in composition which is characterized by the predominance of the ludicrous or absurdly incongruous in the choice or treatment of a theme: distinguished from wit, which implies superior subtlety and finer thought. Humor in literature may be further distinguished by its humane and sympathetic quality, by force of which it is often found blending the pathetic with the ludicrous, and by the same stroke moving to tears and laughter, in this respect improving upon the pure and often cold intellectuality which is the essence of wit.

What an ornament and safeguard is humor! Far better than wit for a poet and writer. It is a genius itself, and so defends from the insanities. Emerson, Scott.

The satire [of Chaucer] . . . is genial with the broad sunshine of humor, into which the victims walk forth with a delightful unconcern. Lowell, Study Windows, p. 254.

In those admirable touches of tender humour—and I should call humour, Bob, a mixture of love and wit—who can equal this great genius [Dickens]? Thackeray, Brown the Younger, i. 3.

Acrimony of the humors. See acrimony.—Albuginaceous, aqueous, crystalline, etc., humor. See the adjectives.—Good humor, a cheerful, tranquil, unruffled temper or disposition. [Often written with a hyphen.]

What then remains, but well our power to use,
And keep good-humour still, whatever we lose?
Pope, R. of the L., v. 30.

This portable quality of good humour seasons all the parts and occurrences we meet with in such a manner that there are no moments lost. Steele, Spectator, No. 100.

Ill humor, disturbed temper; a state of irritation; crossness; moroseness. [Often written with a hyphen.]—Out of humor, displeased; vexed; cross.

As they are out of humour with the World, so they must in time be weary of such slavish and fruitless Devotion, which is not attended with an active Life.

Lister, Journey to Paris, p. 20.

Vitreous humor. See vitreous.—Syn. 3. Vein, predilection.—3. (a) Fancy, whimsey, croquet, fad.—3. (b) and (c) Wit. Humor (see wit); pleasantry, jocoseness, facetiousness, jocularity.

humor, humour (hū' or ū'mōr), v. t. [< humor, n.] 1. To comply with the humor, fancy, or disposition of; soothe by compliance; indulge; gratify.

The king, struck with the beauty of the picture, and thinking blood enough had been already shed upon religious scruples, was resolved to humour the spirit of persecution no farther, . . . and the picture was placed on the altar of Atronsa Mariam.

Bruce, Source of the Nile, II. 88.

We love variety more than any other nation; and so long as the audience will not be pleased without it, the poet is obliged to humour them.

Dryden, Love Triumphant, Ded.

The boy indeed was, at the grandam's side,
Humour'd and train'd, her trouble and her pride.

Crabbe, Works, V. 237.

2. To endeavor to comply with the peculiarities or exigencies of; adapt one's self to; suit or accommodate: as, to humor one's part or the piece.

It is my part to invent, and the musicians to humour that invention.

Dryden.

I thank you, good master, for this piece of merriment, and this song, which was well humoured by the maker, and well remembered by you.

W. Walton, Complete Angler, p. 114.

Not one of whom [Peter Stuyvesant's negroes] but allowed himself to be taken in, and humored his old master's jokes, as became a faithful and well-disciplined dependant.

D. homp, a hump, lump, = LG. hump, heap, hill, stump (Mahn), dim. hümpel, a little heap or mound; perhaps a nasalized form of the root (hup*) of heap, q. v. Cf. Gr. κύβητος, a hump, κύβητα, a hunch on the back, κύβητος, humpbacked, Lith. kumpas, hunchbacked, Skt. kubja, humpbacked. Cf. hummock, hummock.] A protuberance; a swelling.

Here upon this hump of granite Sit with me a quiet while. J. S. Blackie.

Especially—(a) A hunch or protuberance on the back, caused by an abnormal curvature of the spine, or by natural growth: as, a man with a hump; a camel with two humps; the hump on the back of a whale. (b) In entom., a projection on the back of a larva, formed by an upward enlargement of a whole segment, which is then said to be humped. Projections of this kind are very common in the larvæ of the Lepidoptera.

hump (hump), v. [< hump, n.] I. trans. 1. To bend or hunch so as to form a hump, as the back in some kinds of labor, like that of a miner or ditcher, or as cattle in cold or stormy weather.

The ponies did not seem to mind the cold much, but the cattle were very uncomfortable, standing humped up in the bushes except for an hour or two at mid-day when they ventured out to feed.

T. Roosevelt, Hunting Trips, p. 110.

2. To prepare for a great effort; gather (one's self) together; hurry; exert (one's self): as, hump yourself now. [Slang, U. S.]

Col. Burns said, "Now you all watch that critter hump himself."

Philadelphia Times, Aug. 15, 1883.

3. To huff; vex. [Slang.]

In serving me, this rascal of a Frederic has broken a cup, true Japan, upon my honor—the rogue does nothing else. Yesterday, for instance, did he not hump me prodigiously, by letting fall a goblet, after Cellini, of which the carving alone cost me three hundred francs?

Thackeray, Paris Sketch-Book, On some Fashionable [French Novels].

4. In cutlery, to round off, as scissiors.

The humping or rounding of scissiors.

Encyc. Brit., VI. 734.

II. intrans. To use great exertion; put forth effort. [Slang, U. S.]

I spent my evening flitting from one to the other [theater], and got my money's worth out of the hackman, as I made him hump.

Philadelphia Times, Jan. 10, 1886.

humpback (hump'bak), n. 1. A crooked or hunched back.

The . . . chief of the family was born with an humpback and a very high nose.

Tatler.

2. One who has a crooked back; a hunchback.

It was certainly more agreeable to have an ill-natured humpback as a companion than to stand looking out of the study-window.

George Eliot, Mill on the Floss, II. 3.

3. A humpbacked whale of the genus Megaptera.—4. In ichth., a salmon of the genus Oncorhynchus, O. gorbuscha, more fully called humpbacked salmon. See salmon.—Humpback butterfly. See butter-fly, 1 (b).

The European breeds of humpless cattle are numerous.

Darwin, Var. of Animals and Plants, p. 83.

humpty (humpt'i), a. [< humpt (humpt) + -y.] Humped; hunchbacked. [Prov. Eng.]

humpty-dumpty (humpt' ti-dumpt' ti), a. and n. [*< humpty + dumpty*², the latter element made to rhyme with the former.] I. a. Short and broad. Hence the name "Humpty-Dumpty" in "Mother Goose," personifying an egg.

II. a. A favorite Gipsy beverage, consisting of ale boiled with brandy.

humpty² (hum' pi), a. [< hump + -y.] Full of humps; marked by protuberances.

Before the early grass starts in the spring, the emaciated appearance of one of these little ponies in the far North-west will sorely try the feelings of an equine philanthropist, should he look along the humpty ribs and withered quarters. The Century, XXXVII. 339.

humpty² (hum' pi), n.; pl. humpties (-piz). [Australian.] A house; a hut.

But the family loved it, and in spite of the fits of new housebuilding which periodically attacked Mr. Gray, the owner of the station, they continued to dwell in the familiar old bark humpty, so full of happy memories.

A. C. Grant, Bush Life in Queensland, I. 133.

humstrum (hum'strum), n. [< hum + strum; the elements being vaguely used.] 1. A musical instrument out of tune or rudely constructed; a hardy-gurdy. [Prov. Eng.]

Bonnel Thornton had just published a burlesque Ode on St. Cecilia's Day adapted to the ancient British music; viz. the saltbox, the Jewsharp, the marrow-bones and cleaver, the humstrum, or hardy-gurdy, &c. Boswell, Johnson (ed. 1791), I. 227.

2. Music poorly played.

humulin, humuline (hū'mū-lin), n. [< Humulus + -in, *-ine*².] Same as lupulin.

Humulineæ (hū-mū-lin' ē-s), n. pl. [NL., < Humulus (-lin) + -eæ.] A tribe of plants belonging to the natural order Urticaceæ, proposed by Dumortier (1829), typified by the genus Humulus, the hop. This tribe is not retained by recent botanists, the genus being placed in the tribe Cannabineæ.

Humulus (hū'mū-lus), n. [NL., < ML. humulus, humulus, also humulo, humolo, humlo (cf. OF. houblon, hop); appar. of Teut. origin: see *hop*²; but according to another view, < L. humus, the ground, the plant creeping on the ground if not supported.] A genus of dioecyledonous monochlamydeous plants, of the natural order Urticaceæ and tribe Cannabineæ. They have dioecious flowers, the male in loose axillary panicles, with 5 sepals and 5 erect stamens, the female in short axillary and solitary spikes or catkins, with foliaceous imbricated bracts, each 2-flowered, in fruit forming a sort of membranaceous strobile. The plants are twining rough perennials, with mostly opposite, heart-shaped, and palmately 3- to 7-lobed leaves. Only two species are known: H. lupulus, the common hop, widely cultivated, and another, a native of China and Japan. One species, H. palæosilvius, has been found in a fossil state in the Pliocene formation at Meximieux in the department of Ain, France. See cut under *hop*².

humus (hū'mus), n. [L., the earth, the ground, the soil, locative humī (= Gr. χαμαί), on the ground, to the ground: see Homo, chthonic, chameleon, etc. Hence humble, humility, etc.] Vegetable mold. It is a dark-brown or black substance, varying greatly in composition, produced by the decay of vegetable matter with a limited supply of air. It includes the brown vegetable matter of soils generally, as well as swamp-muck, peat, etc. Humus contains several tolerably well-defined chemical compounds, including ulmin and ulmic acid, and humin and humic acid, and is an important factor in the fertility of soils. Also called genin.

humus-plant (hū'mus-plant), n. Same as saprophyte.

Hun¹ (hun), n. [AS. Hūnas and Hūne = Icel. Hūnar = MHG. Huine, etc.; < LL. Hunni, LGr. Οἱ ὕνοι, also LL. Chunnī, Chunī, LGr. Χοῦνοι, Χοῦνοί, pl., LL. sing. Haunus*, Chunus, repr. the native name, identified, with some probability, with that of the Heungnoo or Hiongmu, a people who, according to Chinese annals, constituted, about the end of the 8d century B. C., a powerful empire stretching from the Great Wall of China to the Caspian. This would indicate that the Huns belonged to the Turkish branch of the Ural-Altaic race; in another view, they were of the Finnic branch; but the name is not connected, unless very remotely, with that of the Hungarians (Magyars), also of Finnic origin.] A member of an ancient Asiatic race of warlike nomads, probably of the Mongolian or Tatar stock, first appearing prominently in European history about A. D. 375. In that year they crossed the Volga and the Don, defeated the Goths, and drove them beyond the Danube. In the reign of their king Attila (about 434-454) they overran and ravaged the greater part of Europe, and compelled the Romans to pay tribute. After the death of Attila their power was broken, but their name continued to be applied in an indefinite way during the middle ages. They are described as ugly and savage, having dark complexions, small, deep-set black eyes, broad shoulders, flat noses, and no beard. Some authorities suppose that they were identical with the Finnic Bulgarians of later history.

The north by myriads pours her mighty sons,
Great nurse of Goths, of Alans, and of Huns!
Pope, Dunciad, iii. 90.

White Huns, an ancient people, probably of the Turkish race, who lived in central Asia. They were possibly ancestors of the Turkomans.

Hun² (hun), n. [Partly another use of *Hun*¹, by an erroneous assumption of the identity of the two peoples, and partly (in the U. S.) an abbr. of Hungarian.] A Hungarian.

Where furious Frank and fiery Hun

Shout in their sulphurous canopy.

Campbell, Hohenlinden.

hunch (hunch), n. [Not found in early records, an assimilated form of *hunk*¹, q. v.] 1. A hump; a protuberance: as, the hunch of a camel.—2. A thick piece; a hunk; a lump: as, a hunch of cheese.

His wife brought out the cut loaf and a piece of Wiltshire cheese, and I took them in hand, gave Richard a good hunch, and took another for myself. Cobbett.

3. [< hunch, v.] A push or jog with the fist or elbow, or by a cow with the horn.

hunch (hunch), v. t. [< hunch, n. In def. 2, prob. due in part to hunch, v.] 1. To round or thrust out or up in a protuberance; crook, as the back.

In a lake called Lyn Rathlyn, in Meirionethshire, is a very singular variety of perch: the back is quite hunched, and the lower part of the back bone, next the tail, strangely distorted. Pennant, Brit. Zool., The Common Perch.

Sometimes one of them got up and went to the desk, on which he leaned his elbows, hunching a pair of sloping shoulders to an uncollared neck.

H. James, Jr., The Century, XXXI. 91.

2. To push or thrust with the elbow or (as a cow) with the horn; jog; hook.

Jack's friends began to hunch and push one another.

Arbuthnot, Hist. John Bull.

hunchback (hunch' bakt), n. [*< hunch + back*¹.] A humpback; a humpbacked person.

hunchbacked (hunch' bakt), a. Having a hunched or crooked back.

That foul hunch-backed toad. Shak., Rich. III., iv. 4.

hundred (hun'dred), n. and a. [Early mod. E. also hundreth, dial. hunderd, < ME. hundred, hunderd, hondred, hondert, hondert, also hundreth, hundrith, < AS. hundred, rarely hundreth, ONorth. hundrath (after Icel.) Goth. taihun-taihund, taihun-tēhund, a hundred, of which hund may be regarded as an abbr. or reduced form), i. e. 'the ten-th', *< dakan: see *ten*¹ and *tenth*¹. The same-orig. elements, with-out the suffix -d, -th, appear in OHG. zehanzō = AS. teón-tig, a hundred, E. as if ten-tig*, like twenty, nine-ty, etc. The element hund-, repr. 'ten' or 'tenth', occurs in AS. hund-seofontig, seventy, etc., hund-endeofontig, a hundred and ten (E. as if eleventy*), hund-twelftig, a hundred and twenty (E. as if twenty*), appar. developed by cumulation (hund- and -tig being ult. from the same root, that of ten) from hund-seofon*, i. e. 'ten-seven', 'tenth seven', etc.] I. n. 1. The sum of ninety-nine and one, or of ten tens; the product of ten multiplied by ten; a collection, body, or sum consisting of ten times ten individuals or units; five score. In England hundreds of 6 score, of 132, and of 124 formerly had also a limited use. Similar usages existed in continental Europe. See great hundred, below.

& they chafed, & charred, on chafing that went;
A hundredth of hunters, as I haf herde tell;
Sir Gawayne and the Green Knight (E. E. T. S.), I. 1143.

They sat down in ranks, by hundreds and by fifties.

Mark vi. 40.

2. In early Teutonic hist., a territorial or administrative district; specifically, in southern and central England, a division or subdivision of a county (a corresponding division in northern England being called a wapentake). In ancient Germany the hundred also denoted, according to Tacitus, a group of persons. The origin of the territorial hundred is uncertain. Many consider it to be derived from bodies each composed of a hundred warriors; others find the origin in divisions of a hundred hides of land, groups of a hundred families, etc. The division of hundred was introduced into the colonies of Pennsylvania, Virginia, Maryland, and Delaware, and still exists in the last-named State. These divisions in England were the basis for the organization of the military service and for the administration of fiscal matters; each hundred had its hundred-moot and its hundred-court, with civil and criminal jurisdiction. In Maryland they served for election districts.

The constable's wife

Of some odd hundred in Essex.

B. Jonson, Alchemist, iv. 1.

As ten families of freeholders made up a town or tithing, so ten tithings composed a superior division called a hundred, as consisting of ten times ten families.

Blackstone, Com., Int., § 4.

It is very probable, as already stated, that the colonists of Britain arranged themselves in hundreds of warriors; it is not probable that they carved out the country into equal districts.

Stubbs, Const. Hist., § 45.

Equally involved in obscurity is the beginning of the hundred in Virginia, and the history of its various phases is rather curious, not only because it was the first English local division instituted in America, but, besides having both a territorial and personal significance, it assumed different relations to the general government of the colony at different periods.

Johns Hopkins Hist. Studies, III. 143.

Chiltern Hundreds, a hilly district of Buckinghamshire, England, which has belonged to the British crown from time immemorial. To this district a nominal office is attached, of which the holder is called the Steward of the Chiltern Hundreds. As a member of the House of Commons not in any respect disqualified cannot resign his seat directly, any member who wishes to resign may accomplish his object by accepting the stewardship of one of the Chiltern Hundreds, which, being held to be a place of honor and profit under the crown, vacates the seat. This nominal place is in the gift of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and the recipient usually resigns immediately after appointment.—Council of Five Hundred. See council.—Great hundred, long hundred, in old reckoning, six score; 120. It was legal for balks, deals, eggs, spars, stone, etc. "The technical meaning attached by merchants to the word hundred, associated with certain objects, was six score—a usage which is commemorated, though perhaps in too sweeping and general a form, in the popular distich:

Five score of men, money, and pins,

Six score of all other things.

Pemcock, Encyc. Metropolitana, I. 331.

Old Hundred, properly Old Hundredth, a celebrated tune set in England about the middle of the sixteenth century to Kethe's version of the 100th Psalm, and marked "Old Hundredth" in Tate and Brady's new version in 1696, as being retained from the old version. The earliest extant copy of the tune is in the Genevan psalter of 1554, where it is set to Beza's version of the 134th Psalm; but there is evidence that it was of earlier origin, and was originally a popular tune set to words of a light, gay character.

II. a. [Strictly a collective noun; it is always preceded by a definitive, usually an article or a numeral, and the following noun is, historically, a genitive partitive—a hundred of men, a hundred of dollars, etc.] One more than ninety-nine; ten times ten: as, a hundred men; two hundred dollars; a hundred thousand times. The Hundred Days, the closing period of the first Emperor Napoleon's career in France in 1815, after his escape from Elba. The reckonings of the time are various, none amounting to exactly 100 days. The nearest is that from March 13th, when Napoleon was joined by Ney with his army, to June 22d, the date of his abdication after the battle of Waterloo, making inclusively 102 days; but the most exact reckoning is that of his actual second reign, dating from his reentry into Paris, and making 95 days (March 20th to June 22d).

hundreded (hun'dred-al), a. [hundred + -al.] Pertaining to or involving the organization of a hundred. See hundred, n., 2.

hunting-coat (hun'ting-köt), n. A coat worn by huntsmen, usually of some distinctive color, as scarlet or green.

hunting-cog (hun'ting-cog), n. In mach., an extra cog in that one of two cog-wheels which is thus cut with one tooth more than it would have if the numbers of teeth on the two wheels were to be in a certain ratio to each other. Thus, for example, if a shaft is required to revolve three times as fast as its driving-shaft, 72 and 24 are a pair of numbers for teeth that would effect this result; and such numbers would suit a watchmaker, one being a multiple of the other; but the millwright would add one tooth to the larger wheel (the hunting-cog), and thus obtain 73 and 24, which numbers are prime to each other and yet are very nearly in the desired ratio. In the pair of wheels whose numbers are so obtained, any two teeth which meet in the first revolution are distant by one in the second, by two in the third, and so on; so that one tooth may be said to hunt the other, whence the name. The object of adding the hunting-cog is to effect a change of contact between teeth in consecutive revolutions. (Willis.) hunting-crop (hun'ting-krop), n. See crop, 14. hunting-dog (hun'ting-dog), n. See dog.

Huntingdonian (hun'ting-dö-ni-an), n. Eccles., a member of the Countess of Huntingdon's Connection, a denomination of Calvinistic Methodists in England and Wales, adherents of George Whitefield and Selina, Countess of Huntingdon (1707–91), after their separation from the Wesleys. The sect is congregational in polity.

huntsman's-horn (hunts'manz-hörn'), n. A plant, Sarracenia flava, a native of the southern Atlantic States, having curious leaves resembling a hunter's horn; also, one of the leaves.

hunt's-up (hunts'up), n. [From the sentence "the hunt's up," i. e. the hunt is beginning, common in old songs and as a form of call.] The tune or call formerly played on the horn under the windows of sportsmen to awaken them; hence, in literature, something calculated to arouse.

Is come this morning with a band of French,
To play him hunt's-up with a point of war.
Greene, Orlando Furioso.

No sooner does the earth her flowery bosom brave,
At such time as the year brings on the pleasant spring,
But hunt's up to the morn the feather'd sylvans sing.
Drayton, Polyolbion, xlii. 44.

So dreamy-soft the notes, so far away
They seem to fall the huns of Oberon Blow their faint hunt's-up from the good-time gone.
Lowell, To a Lady Playing on the Cithern.

huon-pine (hü'on-pin'), n. [< huon, a native name, + pine.] A tree of the yew family, Dacrydium Franklinii, found in Tasmania. It is 80 to 100 feet in height and 20 feet in circumference; the wood, which is light-yellow in color, marked with dark wavy lines, is much esteemed in boat-building and various other uses. It is the best Australian wood for carving.

hurdy-gurdy (hēr'di-gēr'di), n. [A riming formula, appar. in imitative description of the sound of the instrument. Cf. hurdy-gurdy.] 1. A musical instrument shaped somewhat like a lute, having four or more strings, two of which are tuned a fifth apart for the production of a drone-bass, and the other two in unison, but so arranged that they can be shortened by pressing finger-keys connected with an apparatus of tangents not unlike that of the clavichord. Additional strings, when present, are intended to reinforce the tone by sympathetic vibration. The strings are sounded by the revolution against them of a rosined wheel turned by a crank for the left hand. The keys are played by the right hand. Theurdy-gurdy is a rustic instrument, its tone being harsh and its artistic manipulation exceedingly limited. It was known to have existed in the ninth century, and was fashionable for a time in the eighteenth century, but is now played only by street musicians. A large variety called the organistrum was intended for two performers, one of whom simply turned the wheel. Other names are lira rustica, viele, rota, and bauernleier.

The Italian boy delights all the ears of those who hear with his hurdy-gurdy. W. Beant, Fifty Years Ago, p. 54.

hurley (hèr'li), n. [Cf. *hurl*¹.] The game of hockey or hurling; also, the stick or club used in this game. [Ireland.]

The game of hockey is called hurley in Ireland; so hurleys are probably hockey-sticks. N. and Q., 7th ser., v. 300.

hurley-house, n. See hurly-house.

hurling¹ (hèr'ling), n. [ME. hurlunge, hurlunge; verbal n. of *hurl*¹, v.] 1. A game in which opposite parties strive to hurl or force a ball through their opponents' goal, or to place it at one of two points in a district of country. As described by Carew in Cornwall in 1602, the former was called hurling to goal, and the latter (in which the people of the whole district took sides) hurling to the country. As played at the present time in Ireland, the game is the same as hockey.

Hurling was practised with a passionate enthusiasm.
Lecky, Eng. in 18th Cent., vii.

Capt. John Smith, Works, I, 122.

Like Jupiter huskt in a female skin.

Hist. Albino and Bellana (1638).

husker (hus'kér), n. [< husk¹ + -er.] 1. One who husks; especially, one who husks corn; one who takes part in a husking-bee. [U. S.]

The corn was piled in the centre of the capacious kitchen; around the heap squatted the huskers.

S. Judd, Margaret, ii. 6.

From many a brown old farm-house, and hamlet without name,

Their milking and their home tasks done, the merry huskers came.

Whittier, The Huskers.

2. A tool or machine for removing the husks from maize.—3. Among oystermen, an oyster-opener; a shucker.—4. pl. In ornith., the Degeubitores, the third order of birds in Macgillivray's system. See Degeubitores.

They are generally gregarious after the breeding season, and feed for the most part on seeds, which they deprive, by means of the sharp edges of the bill, of their outer covering or pericarp, whence the name Huskers, given to the order.

Macgillivray, Hist. British Birds, I, 315.

husk-hackler (hus'hak'ler), n. A machine for shredding corn-husks for stuffing mattresses and cushions. It is essentially a brake, like a hemp-brake, with toothed rolls, between which the husks are passed to split and comb the dried leaves.

The invited neighbors to the husking come.

J. Barlow, Hasty Pudding, iii.

In modern times, the jolly Little God (Cupid) . . . has become modernized in his arts, and invented huskings, apple-bees, sleigh-rides, "droppin's" gymnastics, etc.

Hallberg's Illus. Mag., 1876, p. 686.

husking-bee (hus'king-bē), n. Same as husking, 2. [U. S.]

The shining floor suggests the flail-beat of autumn, that pleasantest of monotonous sounds, and the later husking-bee, where the lads and lasses sit round laughingly busy under the swinging lantern.

Lowell, Fireside Travels, p. 276.

husking-peg (hus'king-peg), n. Same as husking-pin.

husking-pin (hus'king-pin), n. A pin or claw worn upon the hand to assist in tearing open the shuck when husking Indian corn.

husky¹ (hus'ki), a. [< husk¹ + -y.] Abounding with, consisting of, or resembling husks; hence, poor, unprofitable, etc.

Most have found

A husky harvest from the grudging ground.

Dryden, tr. of Virgil's Georgics, i, 314.

husky² (hus'ki), a. [A var. (after *husk*³) of E. dial. hasky, dry, rough, unpleasant, hask, dry, rough, harsh, parched: see *hask*¹, harsk, harsh. According to Skeat, husky stands for husty* or hausty*, < haust¹, hoast, host¹, a dry cough.] Dry in the throat; hoarse; harsh; sounding roughly: said of the voice or utterance.

The priest was a dry old man, with a husky and broken voice, and he proceeded as if all feeling had left his soul long ago. C. E. Norton, Travel and Study in Italy, p. 45.

But the voices sank yet lower, sank to husky tones of fear.

Whittier, Garrison of Cape Ann.

husky³ (hus'ki), n.; pl. huskies (-kiz). [Said to be a corruption of Eskimo.] A kind of dog used in drawing sleds in the Hudson's Bay territory.

The original Husky has always been an animal requiring firm treatment, naturally dangerous, and to a great extent devoid of affection.

Colonial and Indian Exhibitions (1886), p. 75.

huso (hū'sō), n. [NL. < OHG. hūso, MHG. hūse, hūsen, G. hausen = D. hūizen, MD. hūyzen, the huso: see isinglass, which is a corruption of MD. hūyzen-blas, 'huso-bladder.'] 1. The great sturgeon, Acipenser huso, of the rivers falling into the Black and Caspian seas, abounding especially in Russia. See sturgeon.—2. [cap.] A genus of such fishes.

huss¹ (hus), v. i. [A var. of hiss; cf. huzz.] To hiss; whistle, as the wind.

When once we come within a Mile, more or less, of the Cape and stand off to Sea, as soon as we get without it we find such a hussing Breeze that sometimes we are not able to ply against it.

Dampier, Voyages, II, iii. 38.

hussar (hu-zār'), n. [< F. hussard = Sp. húsar, husaro = Pg. hussar = It. ussaro = D. hucar = Dan. Sw. hussar = G. husar, < Hung. huszár, the twentieth, < husz, twenty: so called because Matthias Corvinus (1443-90), King of Hungary and Bohemia, raised a corps of horse-soldiers by commanding that one man should be chosen out of every twenty in each village.] A member of a class of light cavalry originating in Hungary in the middle ages, and now forming part of most European armies. The Hungarian hussars were famed for their activity and courage. Their dress was semi-oriental, and has set the type of uniform for the hussars of other nations. The latter are conspicuous for their fantastic dress, of which important parts have been the dolman and bushy. Of late years the dolman has been abandoned, and the hussar uniform is distinguished by brilliant colors, elaborate braidings, etc.

I was about as perfect a type of the hussar as need be. My jacket seemed to fit tighter—my pelisse hung more jauntily—I my shako sat more saucily on one side of my head.

Lever, Maurice Tierney, viii.

hussif² (huz'if), n. [Also written huzzif; an alteration, simulating *hussif*¹ for *housewife*¹, of *hussy*², which has on the other hand attracted *hussy*¹ into the form *hussy*²: see *hussy*², *hussy*¹.] Same as *hussy*².

Hussite (hus'it), n. [< late ML. Hussite, pl. The name Huss, or more prop. Hus, is an abbr., adopted by Huss himself (about 1396), of his full name (Johann) Hussinetz (so called from his native village Hussinetz).] A follower of John Huss of Bohemia, the religious reformer, who was burned in 1415. The Hussites organized themselves immediately afterward into a politico-religious party, and waged fierce civil war from 1419 to 1434, when they were overcome. They were divided in doctrine into radical and conservative sections, called Taborites and Chekovites; the former finally became merged with the Bohemian Brethren, and the latter partly with the Lutherans and partly with the Roman Catholics.

Of Brownist, Hussite, or of Calvinist, Arminian, Puritan, or Familist.

Taylor's Motto (1622). (Hallivell.)

The cardinal (Beaufort) had already forwarded to Chichele the papal bull under which he was commissioned to raise money for the Hussite crusade.

Crusade, Const. Hist., § 334.

hussy¹ (huz'i), n.; pl. hussies (-iz). [Also written hussey, hussy, and dial. huzz; a reduced form of *hussif*¹, *hussif*¹, *housewife*¹: see *housewife*¹.] 1. The mistress of the house: same as *housewife*¹.

"Dame, ye mon to the pluch [plow] to morne;
I salbe hussy, gif I may."

"Husband" quoth scho, "content am I."

Wyf of Auchtermuchty (Child's Ballads, VIII. 117).

2. A pert, wilful woman or girl; a frolicsome or mischievous girl; a quean; a jade; a wench: used either in reproach or jocely.

Now you think me a corrupt Hussey.

Steele, Conscious Lovers, i. 1.

Meet me in the evening and I'll give you an answer to this. So, hussy, take a kiss beforehand, to put you in mind of me.

Sheridan, The Rivals, II. 2.

hussy² (huz'i), n.; pl. hussies (-iz). [Also written hussy; usually regarded as a particular use of *hussy*¹ = *housewife*¹ = *housewife*¹, but according to Skeat < Icel. húsi, a case (comp. skaris-húsi, a scissors-case), < hús (= Norw. huss), a house, also a case, = AS. hūs, a house: see *house*¹.] A case for scissors, needles, thread, etc. Also housewife, hussif.

I went towards the pond, the maid following me, and dropt purposely my hussy; and when I came near the tiles I said, "Mrs. Alice, I have dropt my hussy."

Richardson, Pamela, I. 162.

husti. An obsolete past participle of hush.

hustilment, n. See hustilment.

husting (hus'ting), n. [< ME. husting (> OF. husteng), a council, < late AS. hūsting, a council (of Danes), < Icel. hūsting, a council or meeting to which a king, earl, or captain summoned his people or guardsmen, < hús (= AS. hūs, E. *house*¹) + thing, a thing; as a law term, an assembly, meeting, a general term for any public meeting, esp. for purposes of legislation; a parliament, including courts of law; = AS. and E. thing: see *house*¹ and thing.] 1. A public meeting for conference; a council; specifically, a court: now usually in the plural, hustings, used also as singular. Courts so called were formerly held in many cities of England, as Great Yarmouth, Lincoln, York, and Norwich, and are still held in London, before the mayor, recorder, and sheriffs. They formerly had exclusive authority in all real and mixed actions for the recovery of land within the city, except ejectment, but their jurisdiction has fallen into comparative desuetude. In Virginia, the municipal courts established in cities of over 5,000 inhabitants were at one time called hustings courts.

A husting court (for the purpose of a city of London school) was held in 1885, and again in 1888.

Academy (London), June 1, 1889, p. 374.

[By Henry the First's charter to London] the ancient assemblies, husting, folk-motes, ward-motes, are to be kept up.

E. A. Freeman, Norman Conquest, V. 314.

Now the idea of representation begins to work in the National Council—the Sheriff of each Shire is directed to send up a certain number of freeholders, or royal tenants, to talk with the King. These are chosen by the free votes of their fellows at the Shire-moot or Hustings, as it was called later.

A. Buckland, Nat. Institutions, p. 11.

2. pl. (also as singular). A temporary platform on which nominations of members of Parliament were made, and from which a candidate addressed his constituency. Since the passing of the Ballot Act of 1872 the use of hustings has been discontinued, but the word is still used with reference to any platform from which electioneering speeches are delivered. [Great Britain.]

I stood on the hustings, . . . less like a candidate than an unconcerned spectator of a public meeting.

Burke, Speech at Bristol.

That so, when the rotten hustings shake

In another month to his brazen lies

A wretched vote may be gain'd. Tennyson, Maud, vi.

He was . . . a second-rate hustings orator.

Disraeli, quoted in Edinburgh Rev., CLXIII. 513.

Hustings court, in Richmond and other cities of Virginia, a court having a criminal jurisdiction nearly exclusive as to offenses committed within the city limits, and a jurisdiction in many other cases, civil and criminal, concurrent with the circuit court, but wholly limited.

hustle (hus'l), v.; pret. and pp. hustled, ppr. hustling. [< D. hutselen, shake, jolt, freq. of hutsen, hutsen, shake, jog, jolt, > ult. E. hoteh: see hoteh.] 1. trans. To shake or throw together confusedly or in a disorderly manner; shove roughly, as by crowding; jostle: as, to hustle things out of the way; he was hustled off the course.

She saw a blue-jay washing itself, ducking its crest, and hustling the water with its wings. S. Judd, Margaret, i. 2.

And then

Was hustled by the sullen baffled men

Who shouldered past him back into the hall.

William Morris, Earthly Paradise, II. 352.

A beggar woman hustled the duchess as she was standing astonished because her maid had left her to carry her own bag.

Fronds, Sketches, p. 42.

When night after night a ministry is hustled and jostled in argument; when its members are unable to hold their own in the fiery ordeal of House of Commons interrogation, . . . their end is not far off.

Edinburgh Rev., CLXV. 272.

II. intrins. 1. To push or crowd; move about with difficulty, as in a crowd; shuffle or shamble hurriedly.

Leaving the king, who had hustled along the floor with his dress woefully ill-arranged. Scott.

Every theatre had its footmen's gallery; an army of the liveried race hustled round every chapel-door. Thackeray.

2. To make haste; move or act energetically: as, come, hustle now. [Colloq., U. S.]—3. To shake up the halfpence in the bag of pitch and hustle. See below.

The owner of the nearest halfpenny claims the privilege to hustle first. Strutt, Sports and Pastimes, p. 370.

Pitch and hustle, an old game in which the contestants pitch halfpence at a mark, to see who can come the nearest to it. The halfpence are then collected, shaken together, and deposited on the ground, and that player who has pitched one of his halfpence nearest the mark takes all those which turn head upward. The remaining halfpence are again shaken together and deposited on the ground, and the player who pitched a halfpenny next nearest the mark takes all that turn head upward. This continues until all the halfpence are taken. Strutt.

hustle-cap (hus'l-kap), n. Same as pitch and hustle. See hustle, v. i.

Squandered what little money they could procure at hustle-cap and chuck-farthing.

Irving, Knickerbocker, p. 175.

hustlement (hus'l-ment), n. [< ME. hustlement, hustilment, hostilment, < OF. hustilment, hostilment, hostilment, ostilment, an implement, pl. furniture, also simply hostil, ostil, ustil, later oustil, F. outil, an implement, utensil, < ML. as if ustellum*, < L. ustilari, use often, freq. of uti, use: see utensil and use.] 1. hutter, v. A Middle English form of hit.

Huttonian (hu-tō'ni-an), a. In geol., relating to the views and theories of James Hutton (1726–1797). Hutton wrote and published voluminously in various departments of natural science and metaphysics, but when the term Huttonian is used it is generally with reference to his work in geology. The most important features of Hutton's theories was his attempt to explain the former changes of the earth's crust by the aid of natural agencies exclusively. In opposition to Werner, he maintained that granite and basalt were rocks which had undergone fusion by subterranean heat, and this view and others held by him were for some years the subject of violent controversies.

hut-urn (hut'ern), n. A type of cinerary urn of pottery peculiar to the primitive Italic peoples, and anterior to Etruscan or other foreign influence. The form of the urn is that of a circular cabin or hut, with a conical roof, imitating a rude structure in osiers plastered with clay. These urns are found in all the sites of archaic Italic civilization, as at Vetulonia, Civita Castellana, in the oldest tombs of Corneto, in the ancient necropolis of Torre del Mordillo near Sybaris, and notably in the cemetery of Alba Longa, beneath the strata of eruptive deposits from the volcanoes of Latium. The form persisted in the Roman temples of Vesta, which were always circular and with a conical roof, like the primeval huts of the race. Sometimes called house-urn.

Hut-urn.

hyacinth (hi-a-sin-th), n. [In older E. jacinth, jacint (see jacinth), < OF. hyacinthe, < L. hyacinthus, < Gr. ῥάκινθος, the hyacinth (a plant-name appar. comprehending the blue iris, the gladiolus, and the larkspur); also a precious stone of blue color (prob. not the mod. hyacinth, but perhaps the sapphire); origin obscure; according to one conjecture, connected with lav (Fiov*) = L. vio-la, violet. Doublet jacinth, jacint.] 1. An ornamental bulbous plant of the genus Hyacinthus (H. orientalis), natural order Liliaceae. It is a native of the Levant, and grows in abundance about Aleppo and Bagdad. The root is a tunicated bulb; the leaves are broad and green; the scape is erect, bearing numerous often drooping bell-shaped flowers of almost all colors, and both single- and double-flowered. The hyacinth appears first to have been cultivated as a garden-flower by the Dutch about the beginning of the sixteenth century. It was introduced into England about the end of that century, and is now one of the most popular of cultivated bulbous plants. [The so-called yellow sickness of the hyacinth is produced by a parasitic bacterium which occurs as yellow slimy masses in the vessels. "In the resting bulb the bacteria are confined to the vascular bundles of the bulb-scales; at flowering time they are found also in the leaves, and not in the vessels only, but in the parenchyma also, where they fill the intercellular spaces, [and] destroy the cells." (De Bary, Comp. Morph. and Biol., p. 482.)]

2. By transfer, a plant of some other genus. The California hyacinth is a plant of the Liliaceae genus Brodiaea; the Cape hyacinth, Scilla corymbosa and S. brachyphylla; the fair-haired hyacinth, Muscari comosum; the grape-hyacinth, or globe-hyacinth, the genus Muscari; the lily-hyacinth, Scilla Lilio-Hyacinthus; the Missouri hyacinth, a plant of either of the genera Hesperanthus and Brodiaea; the hyacinth of Peru, Scilla Peruviana; the star-hyacinth, Scilla amena; the starch-hyacinth, Muscari racemosum; the tassel-hyacinth, Muscari comosum; the wild hyacinth, Camassia (Scilla) Fraseri.

3. (a) Among the ancients, a gem of bluish-violet color, supposed to be the sapphire. (b) In modern usage, a gem of a reddish-orange color which is a variety of the mineral zircon. Some varieties of garnet and topaz also receive this name.

Dishes of agat set in gold, and studded With emeralds, sapphires, hyacinths, and rubies. B. Jonson, Alchemist, II. 1.

4. In her., the tincture tenney or tawny when blazoning is done by colors of precious stones. See blazon.—5. In ornith., a purple gallinule, as of the genus Ionornis or Porphyrio; a sultan.—Hyacinth beans. See Egyptian bean, under bean.

hyacinthian (hi-a-sin'thi-an), a. Same as hyacinthine.

hyacinthine (hi-a-sin'thin), a. [L. hyacinthinus, < Gr. ῥάκινθος, hyacinthine, < ῥάκινθος, hyacinth: see hyacinth.] 1. Made or consisting of hyacinth; resembling hyacinth in color or odor.

Hyacinthine locks

2. Very beautiful or attractive: in allusion to Hyacinthus, a youth fabled to have been loved by Apollo.

The hyacinthine boy, for whom Morn well might break and April bloom. Emerson, Threnody.

Hyacinthus (hi-a-sin'thus), n. [NL., < L. hyacinthus: see hyacinth.] A genus of liliaceous bulbous plants, including about 30 species, natives of central Europe, Asia, and Africa. It is characterized by having the perianth infundibuliform campanulate, not constricted at the throat, the lobes shorter, or rarely longer, than the tube, and the stamens fixed in the tube or throat, with slender filaments dilated at the base. H. orientalis has been long celebrated for the endless varieties which culture has produced from it. H. Romanus (the Roman hyacinth), a small white-blossomed species, is often grown as an early spring flower; there is also a pale-blue Roman hyacinth. H. amethystinus is the amethyst or Spanish hyacinth, and H. candidus the white Cape hyacinth. See cut under hyacinth.

Hyades (hi-a-dēz), n. pl. [L., < Gr. ῥάδες (sing. ῥάς not used), prob. < ῥέ (cf. LGr. ῥάς, a sow) = L. sus, a pig, swine, like the equiv. L. sucula, the Hyades, lit. 'piggings', < sus, a pig: see sus, sow, and swine. But the ancient derivation was < Gr. ῥέω, rain, whence Virgil calls them Pluviae, 'rainy' (see pluvius). See also the def.] 1. In astron., a group of about seven stars, of which the principal is Aldebaran, in the head of the Bull, supposed by the ancients to indicate the approach of rainy weather when they rose with the sun. In Greek mythology the Hyades were originally nymphs who nursed the infant Bacchus, and were transformed into stars in compassion for their incessant weeping for the fate of their brother, who was torn to pieces by a wild beast. Also Hyads.

Thro' scudding drifts the rainy Hyades Vext the dim sea. Tennyson, Ulysses.

2. [Used as a singular.] In entom., a genus of lepidopterous insects. Boisduval.

Hyads (hi'adz), n. pl. Same as Hyades, 1.

Then sailors quarter'd heaven, and found a name For every fix'd and every wandering star; The Pleiads, Hyads, and the Northern Car. Dryden, tr. of Virgil's Georgics, I. 207.

Hyæna (hi-ē'nā), n. [NL., < L. hyæna, hyæna: see hyæna.] 1. (a) The typical genus of the family Hyænidæ. There are two living species of the genus in its restricted use: the common striped hyæna, H. striata, and the brown hyæna, H. brunnea. The spotted hyæna is H. crocuta, or Crocuta maculata. The genus is now confined to the warmer parts of the old world, but the cave-hyæna, H. spelæus, formerly inhabited much of Europe, its remains being now found in caverns in Germany, France, and England. See cut under hyæna. (b)

[l. c.] The Linnean specific name of Canis hyæna, equivalent to the modern family Hyænidæ.—2. In ichth., a genus of fishes. Oken, 1816.—3. [l. c.] See hyæna.

Hyænarctidæ (hi-ē-nark'ti-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Hyænarctos + -idæ.] A family of fossil arctoid mammals, the type of which is the genus Hyænarctos.

Hyænarctos (hi-ē-nark'tos), n. [NL., < Gr. ῥάκινθος, hyæna, + ἄρκτος, a bear: see arctic.] A genus of fossil bear-like carnivorous mammals from the Miocene and Pliocene, referred to the Ursidæ, or made the type of a family Hyænarctidæ. The genus, established by Cautley and Falconer, is equivalent to Arctotherium of Wagner, Sivalarctos and Amphiarctos of De Blainville, and Hemicyon of Lartet. Fossil remains referred to this genus have been named H. hemicyon and H. insignis.

hyænic, a. See hyenic.

Hyænidæ (hi-ē-ni-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Hyæna + -idæ.] A family of Fera fissipedia, belonging to the series Eluroidea hyeniformis; the hyenas. They have 3 incisors and 1 canine on each side above and below, 4 premolars in each upper and 3 in each lower half-jaw, and 1 molar on each side above and below—in all 34 teeth, which are very strong. The large molars are close together; the upper true molars are reduced in size, and tubercular; and the lower true molars and last upper premolar are sectorial. The feet are digitigrade, with blunt non-retractile claws; the tail is short and bushy; the eyes and ears are prominent; and the tongue is rough with prickles. There are two genera, Hyæna and Crocuta. With Hyænida proper is sometimes associated the genus Proteles, now usually made the type of a family Proteledæ. See hyæna.

hyeniform, a. See hyeniform.

Hyæniforma (hi-en-i-fôr-mi-ä), n. pl. [NL., < Hyæna + L. forma, form.] A group or series of Eluroidea, constituted by the families Hyænida and Proteledæ, having 34 or 32 teeth, no tubercular true molar in the lower jaw, no septum of the auditory bulla, and digitigrade feet.

hyænine, a. See hyenine.

Hyænodon (hi-en-ô-don), n. [NL., < Gr. hæna, hyæna, + ôdôn (ôdôn-) = E. tooth.] A genus of fossil carnivorous mammals of the Eocene and Lower Miocene, of uncertain systematic position. They had apparently 44 teeth, of a canine type; the fourth upper premolar and first lower molar were sectorial, and all the succeeding teeth were also sectorial, but not tuberculate as in existing carnivores. In H. leptorhynchus, for example, the last lower molar is the largest and most completely sectorial of the series. This species is described by Boyd Dawkins, from the Upper Eocene of Hordwell. Many other species have been found in both Europe and America. The animals were about as large as leopards.

Hyænodontidæ (hi-en-ô-don-ti-dê), n. pl. [NL., < Hyænodon (t-) + -idæ.] A family of extinct carnivorous mammals, represented by the genus Hyænodon.

hyænoïd, a. See hyenoid.

Hyæalea, n. See Hyæala, 1. Lamarck, 1799.

Hyæleidæ (hi-ä-lê-i-dê), n. pl. See Hyæleidæ. Cantraine.

Hyæala (hi-ä-lê-ä), n. [NL., < Gr. hælos, of glass, < hælos, glass: see hyaline.] 1. The genus of pteropods which gives name to the family Hyæalidæ: a synonym of Caivolina. Also wrongly spelled Hyæala. Lamarck, 1801; Cuvier, 1817. See out under Caivolina.—2. A genus of lepidopterous insects. Guenée, 1854.

Hyæalea (hi-ä-lê-ä-sê-ä), n. pl. [NL., < Hyæala + -acea.] A group of pteropods, including the genus Hyæala. Also wrongly spelled Hyæalea. Menke, 1828.

Hyæalidæ (hi-ä-lê-i-dê), n. pl. [NL., < Hyæala + -idæ.] A family of thecosomate pteropods, taking name from the genus Hyæala; the glass-shells: synonymous with Caivolinidæ. Also (wrongly) Hyæalidæ and Hyæalidæ.

hyalescence (hi-ä-les-ens), n. [hyalescen (t) + -ce.] The process of becoming, or the quality or state of being, glassy in texture or transparency; glassiness.

hyalescent (hi-ä-les-ent), a. [hyalos, glass, + -escent.] Becoming hyaline; exhibiting hyalescence; hyaloid.

hyalin (hi-ä-lin), n. [hyalinus, < Gr. hælanos, of glass: see hyaline.] The chief nitrogenous constituent of hydatid cysts, containing about 5 per cent. of nitrogen. When boiled with sulphuric acid it is said to yield 60 per cent. of its weight of a dextrorotatory sugar. Gamgee.

hyaline (hi-ä-lin), a. and n. [= F. hyaline = Sp. hialino = Pg. hialino, < LL. hialinus, < Gr. hælanos, of glass, < hælos, also hælos, glass, a word said to be of Egyptian origin; glass was first made in Egypt.] 1. a. Glassy; resembling glass; consisting of glass; crystalline; transparent: as, the hyaline or crystalline lens of the eye. In anatomy the word is specifically applied to the purest or most typical kind of cartilage, as that of the fetal skeleton, articular ends of adult bones, etc., as distinguished from fibrocartilage and other varieties.—Hyaline cartilage. See cartilage.—Hyaline degeneration, in pathol., transformation of tissues into a glassy substance resembling lardaceous tissue, but not giving its chemical reactions. It affects the walls of the blood-vessels, involuntary muscular fiber, and apparently interstitial connective tissue. Also called vitreous, fibrinous, and vagay degeneration.—Hyaline layer, Kölliker's name of the innermost layer of a hair-follicle.

II. n. 1. A glassy or transparent substance or surface.

Witness this new-made world, another heaven,
From heaven-gate not far, founded in view
On the clear hyaline, the glassy sea.

Milton, P. L., vii. 619.

Specifically—(a) The hyaloid membrane of the eye. See hyaloid. (b) Hyaline cartilage. See cartilage. (c) A pellucid substance which determines the spontaneous division of cells or originates cell-nuclei; hyaloplasm.

hyalite (hi-ä-lit), n. [hyalos, glass, + -ite.] Cf. hyalite, of glass.] A pellucid variety of opal, resembling colorless gum or resin. It is white, sometimes with a shade of yellow, blue, or green, and occurs in small botryoidal incrustations, especially on basaltic rocks. Also called Muller's glass.

hyalithe (hi-ä-lith), n. [Contr. < Gr. hælos, glass, + lithos, stone.] A strong, dark-colored glass, sometimes used as a substitute for porcelain.

hyalitis (hi-ä-li-tis), n. [NL., < Gr. hælos, glass, with ref. to the vitreous humor, + -itis.] In pathol., inflammation of the vitreous humor.

hyalo- [Gr. hælos, glass: see hyaline.] An element in some scientific compounds, meaning 'glass.' As a prefix to names of rocks, it indicates that the forms thus designated are in a more or less completely vitrified condition: thus, hyalo-andesite, hyalo-basalt, hyalo-trachyte, etc.

hyalograph (hi-ä-lô-gráf), n. [Gr. hælos, glass, + gráphein, write.] An instrument for etching on a transparent surface.

hyalography (hi-ä-log-ráf-i), n. [Gr. hælos, glass, + -γραφία, < gráphein, write.] The art of writing or engraving on glass.

hyaloid (hi-ä-lô-id), a. and n. [LL. hyaloides, glass-green, < Gr. hæloioús, like glass, < hælos, glass, + eidós, form.] 1. a. Hyaline; transparent; glassy.—Hyaloid canal. See canal.—Hyaloid membrane, the capsule of the vitreous humor of the eye; a delicate, pellucid, and nearly structureless membrane, investing the vitreous body except in front, where it is continuous with the suspensory ligament of the crystalline lens. See second cut under eye.

II. n. The hyaloid membrane.

hyaloiditis (hi-ä-lô-i-dí-tis), n. [NL., < hyaloid + -itis.] In pathol., inflammation of the hyaloid membrane.

hyalomelan (hi-ä-lom-é-lan), n. [Gr. hælos, glass, + melas (mé-lan-), black.] One of the names formerly given by mineralogists to glassy varieties of basalt, under the idea that these were simple homogeneous minerals. See tachylite and obsidian.

Hyalonema (hi-ä-lô-nê-mä), n. [NL., < Gr. hælos, glass, + néma, a thread.] The typical genus of the family Hyalonemidæ.

hyalonemid (hi-ä-lô-nê-mid), n. A glass-sponge of the order Silicoidæ, and typified by the genus Hyalonema, having a long stem of fine siliceous threads, at one end of which is the sponge proper; the glass-ropes sponges. There are several other genera, as Pheronema, Stylocalyx, and Poliopogon. Also Hyalonemidæ.

Hyalonemidæ (hi-ä-lô-nem-i-dê), n. pl. [NL., < Hyalonema + -idæ.] A family of hexactinellid sponges, or glass-sponges, of the order Silicoidæ, and typified by the genus Hyalonema, having a long stem of fine siliceous threads, at one end of which is the sponge proper; the glass-ropes sponges. There are several other genera, as Pheronema, Stylocalyx, and Poliopogon. Also Hyalonemidæ.

hyaloplasm (hi-ä-lô-plazm), n. [Gr. hælos, glass, + plasma, anything formed: see plasm.] A clear, homogeneous protoplasm; hyaline.

The subdivisions within the fibre are the "primitive tubules," and these contain the "hyaloplasm," which is the true nervous substance.

Amer. Jour. Psychol., I. 487.
A distinct granular condition becomes apparent in what was the homogeneous hyaloplasm.

Jour. Roy. Micros. Soc., 2d ser., VI. (ii. 159).

hyaloplasmic (hi-ä-lô-plaz-mik), a. Having the character of hyaloplasm.

hyalopterous (hi-ä-lop-tê-rus), a. [Gr. hælos, glass, + ptéron, wing.] Having hyaline or transparent wings, as an insect.

hyalosiderite (hi-ä-lô-sid-é-rit), n. [Gr. hælos, glass, + sideritis, of iron, < σίδηρος, iron: see siderite.] A brown ferruginous variety of olivin or chrysolite.

hyalospermous (hi-ä-lô-spér-mus), a. [Gr. hælos, glass, + σπέρμα, seed.] Having transparent seeds. [Rare.]

Hyalospongiæ (hi-ä-lô-spon-jí-dê), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. hælos, glass, + σπγγία, a sponge.] A superfamily group of sponges, equivalent to Hexactinellidæ or Hyalonemidæ in a broad sense; the glass-sponges. In Claus's system of classification the Hyalospongiæ are the fourth order of the class Spongiæ, characterized as sponges with a firm, often hyaline, latticework of 6-rayed siliceous spicules, which may be cemented together by a stratified siliceous substance.

hyalotekite (hi-ä-lô-tê-kít), n. [Prop. hyalotekite, < Gr. hælos, glass, + τέκνιν, melt, + -ite.] A silicate of lead with barium and calcium, from Sweden. It occurs in white to gray crystalline masses, with a vitreous to greasy luster, and fuses easily to a clear glass.

Hyas (hi-äs), n. [NL.: see Hyades.] A genus of birds: same as Cursorius.

Hyawa gum. See gum.

hibernaclet, n. An obsolete form of hibernacle.

hibernater, hibernation. Obsolete forms of hibernate, hibernation.

Hyblean (hi-blê-an), a. [L. Hyblæus, < Hybla, Hybla, < Gr. Υβλη: see def.] Pertaining to Hybla, an ancient city on the coast of Sicily, north of Syracuse, celebrated for the honey produced on the neighboring hills. The honey of Hybla is sometimes incorrectly ascribed to a Mount Hybla. The city was closely connected and finally apparently identical with the later one of Megara (Megara Hyblæa). It was also called Hybla Minor, to distinguish it from another Sicilian town, Hybla Major.

Hybocodon (hi-bok-ô-don), n. [NL., < Gr. hýbos, humpbacked, + kódon, a bell.] The typical genus of the family Hybocodontidæ. Agassiz, 1860.

Hybocodontidæ (hi-bok-ô-don-ti-dê), n. pl. [NL., < Hybocodon + -idæ.] A family of gymnoblastoid hydroid hydrozoans, represented by the genus Hybocodon.

hybodont (hib-ô-dont), a. and n. [Hybodus (hybodont-), q. v.] I. a. Pertaining to or having the characters of the Hybodontidæ. Also cladodont.

II. n. A fish of the genus Hybodus or family Hybodontidæ.

Hybodontes (hib-ô-don-têz), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. hýbos, humpbacked, hýbos, a hump, + ôdôn (ôdôn-) = E. tooth.] A group of fossil sharks, corresponding to the family Hybodontidæ. Agassiz.

hybodontid (hib-ô-don-tid), n. One of the Hybodontidæ.

Hybodontidæ (hib-ô-don-ti-dê), n. pl. [NL., < Hybodus (dant-) + -idæ.] A family of fossil sharks, typified by the genus Hybodus. They are characterized by teeth with broad fixed bases, which have a large cusp or cone, and two or more lesser secondary cones on the sides. The fin-spines are grooved, and situated in front of each of the two dorsal fins; the skin is covered with sparse shagreen. The family prevailed throughout the Oolitic, Triassic, and Cretaceous periods. In Owen's system of classification the family, together with the Cestraciontæ, composes the suborder Cestracanthi of the order Euglossomati. The species were very closely related to the Heterodontidæ or Cestraciontæ, and are by some referred to that family.

Hybodus (hib-ô-dus), n. [NL., < Gr. hýbos, humpbacked, hýbos, a hump, + ôdôn (ôdôn-) = E. tooth.] The typical genus of Hybodontidæ. Agassiz.

hybrid (hi-bríd or hib-rid), n. and a. [Formerly hybride; < F. hybride = Sp. híbrido = Pg. híbrido = It. ibrido, < L. hybrida, hibrida, ibrida, a mongrel, a hybrid. The spelling hybrida rests on the very doubtful assumption that the word is derived from Gr. hýbris (hýbrís-), insult, wantonness, outrage.] I. n. 1. The offspring or progeny of animals or plants of different varieties, species, or genera; a half-breed or cross-breed; a mongrel. Hybrid animals are more or less frequent according to the less or greater zoological difference of their parents. Thus, the commonest are those resulting from the union of opposite sexes of varieties of the same species; and these hybrids are in fact of much more frequent occurrence than has usually been supposed. Hybrids or half-breeds of the human race are among the best-known examples, and the occurrence of hybrids among plants is very frequent. The most familiar hybrids between distinct species are mules, bred between the horse and the ass. Hybrids between different genera are rare; but they occur, as in the case of the cross between the dog and the fox. The fertility of hybrids among themselves is as a rule proportionate to the nearness of their parent: fertile hybrids between varieties being common, those between species less so, those between genera least so. Hybrids between distinct species are commonly infertile, at least with one another, though they may propagate with an individual of the pure breed of either parent. The natural tendency is thus for hybrids to die out unless artificially kept up by repeated cross-breeding. But the degree of sterility is not always dependent solely upon the zoological affinity of the parents, for reciprocal hybrids of the same two species may differ in this respect. In botany a hybrid is an individual which results from the union of the male element of one species of plant with the female of another, a process frequently occurring in oaks, willows, etc. The resulting offspring resembles both parents, yet differs in certain more or less marked characters from either. A graft-hybrid is an individual, or a part of an individual, which results from the grafting of one species upon the stock of another species. Ordinarily the ingrafted species retains its individual peculiarities nearly or quite intact, yet, as stated above, it may in exceptional cases become a sort of hybrid by exhibiting the peculiarities of both.

Hence—2. Anything which is a product or mixture of two heterogeneous things, or comes from two different sources, as a word formed of elements from two different languages. See II. 2.—Reciprocal hybrids, hybrids the sexes of whose respective parents are reversed. Thus, the mule of a stallion and a she-ass, and the mule of a jackass and a mare, are reciprocal hybrids.

II. a. 1. Produced from the union of opposite sexes of two different or distinct varieties, species, or genera; half-bred; cross-bred; mongrel. See 1.

Hyalonema strobila, reduced.

The mere fact that not only animals of distinct genera, but even those classed in distinct families—as the pheasant and the black grouse—sometimes produce hybrid offspring in a state of nature, is itself an argument against there being any constant infertility between the most closely allied species.

A. R. Wallace, Fortnightly Rev., N. S., XL, 311.

Hence—2. Of heterogeneous origin; having a mixed character; combining diverse elements, as a word formed from two different languages, architecture combining diverse styles, etc. Hybrid words of various kinds abound in English. Examples are bank-rupt, dis-belief, at-one-ment, and eat-able, in which Tenue and Latin elements are joined. In natural history hybrid names are generally condemned, though many have been retained in science; it is not regarded as an infringement of the laws of procedure to rectify or wholly reject them. A word bodily transferred from Greek to Latin and then taking the Latin inflections is not regarded as a hybrid; but if Greek and Latin inflections or Greek and Latin stems are mixed it is so regarded. Some hybrids have come into general use, and have been allowed to remain.—Hybrid porcelain, a ceramic ware which is not strictly hard porcelain like that of China, nor the soft-paste porcelain discovered in France, much used in Europe before the discovery of the secret of hard porcelain by Bottcher at Meissen. Quartz and a glassy frit enter into the composition of this ware, with but little kaolin.—Hybrid syllogism, an indirect syllogism.

hybridisable, hybridisation, etc. See hybridizable, etc.

hybridism (hi'bri- or hib'ri-dizm), n. [hybrid + -ism.] 1. The state or condition of being hybrid; the character of a hybrid. Also hybridity.

Until recently, the interest attaching to hybridism was almost entirely of a practical nature.

G. J. Romanes, Encyc. Brit., XII, 422.

2. The act of hybridizing; the production or formation of hybrids of any kind.

To tack on to a Gothic root a classical termination (and vice versa) is to be guilty of Hybridism. . . . Hybridism is the commonest fault that accompanies the introduction of new words.

Latham, Eng. Lang., §§ 247, 248.

Inappropriate hybridism is checked by the Law of Sterility. H. Drummond, Natural Law in Spiritual World, [Pref., p. xiii.]

hybridist (hi'bri- or hib'ri-dist), n. [hybrid + -ist.] One who hybridizes. Quarterly Rev.

hybridity (hi- or hib-ri-dī'ti), n. [hybrid, a., + -ity.] Same as hybridism, 1.

The test of hybridity cannot be applied in one case in ten thousand.

A. R. Wallace, Nat. Select., p. 161.

The investigation of the whole subject of crossing and hybridity had shown that . . . crosses between slightly different varieties led to increased fertility.

The Century, XXV, 427.

hybridizable (hi'bri- or hib'ri-dī-zā-bl), a. [hybridize + -able.] Capable of hybridizing or of being hybridized; able to produce hybrid offspring by crossing with another species. Also spelled hybridisable.

Hybridizable genera are rarer than is generally supposed, even in gardens, where they are so often operated upon under circumstances most favourable to the production of hybrids.

J. D. Hooker.

hybridization (hi'bri- or hib'ri-dī-zā'shon), n. [hybridize + -ation.] The act or process of hybridizing, or the state of being hybridized; cross-fertilization; cross-breeding. See hybrid, n., 1. Also hybridisation.

For anything we can show to the contrary, many existing species may have had their origin in hybridization.

Lond. Jour. Sci., CXXIV, 190.

hybridize (hi'bri- or hib'ri-dī-z), v.; pret. and pp. hybridized, ppr. hybridizing. [hybrid + -ize.] I. trans. 1. To cause to interbreed and thus produce hybrids.

Yet in some other genera [than Primula], species which are not heterostyled, and which in some respects appear not well adapted for hybrid-fertilisation, have likewise been largely hybridized.

Darwin, Different Forms of Flowers, p. 55.

Hence—2. To form or construct in a hybrid manner, as words.

II. intrans. To produce a hybrid or hybrids; cross or interbreed, as two different varieties or species of plants or animals.

Also spelled hybridise.

hybridizer (hi'bri- or hib'ri-dī-zēr), n. One who crosses different varieties or species, etc., to produce hybrids; a hybridist. Also spelled hybridiser.

The evidence from fertility adduced by different hybridizers.

Darwin, Origin of Species (6th ed.), p. 237.

It is important to remark that hybridizers usually experiment with very distinct species.

See, Fortnightly Rev., N. S., XI, 310.

hybridous (hi'bri- or hib'ri-dus), a. [hybrid, n., + -ous.] Of hybrid character; heterogeneous. [Rare.]

No hybridous architecture or nondescript figures.

N. A. Rev., CXL, 290.

hydatid (hi'dā-tid), n. and a. [Gr. hēdatēs (-id-), a water-colored gem, < Gr. hēdatēs (-id-), a drop of water, a water-vesicle, hydatid, a gem, < hēdatēs (-id-), water: see hydra, hydro-.] I. n.

1. In pathol., a cyst with aqueous contents found in the tissue, formed by a tania in its larval state, especially in man by Tenia echinococcus. The name has also been applied loosely to various other cysts filled with a watery fluid. More fully called a false hydatid.

2. In zool., the encysted larval state of the wandering scolex of a tapeworm, especially of Tenia echinococcus. Its character was formerly misunderstood, and it was called Echinococcus lomatæ when occurring in man. Other true hydatids, in a zoological sense, are called cysticerci and centures. See echinococcus, cysticercus, centure, and cut under Tenia.

This remarkably minute parasite (the hydatigenous tapeworm, Tenia echinococcus), though not resident in man in its adult condition, is nevertheless in one of its larval stages of frequent occurrence in the human body. Whilst the full-grown creature seldom attains the fourth of an inch in length, the larva, on the other hand, acquire a prodigious size. The latter are familiarly known to the [medical] profession under the name of hydatids.

T. S. Cobbold, Tapeworms (1886), p. 55.

Hydatid of Morgagni, in anat., a name applied to the one or more small pedunculated growths which lie beside the globus major of the epididymis, and are formed mainly of connective tissue and blood-vessels. They are commonly regarded as the remains of Müller's duct.

II. a. In zool., encysted; being in the cystic state, as the larva of a tapeworm when it is a cysticercus, centure, or echinococcus.

hydatidiform (hi-dā-tid'i-fōrm), a. [Gr. hēdatēs (-id-), a hydatid, + L. forma, form.] Resembling or having the character of a hydatid. Also hydatiform.

They [tubes in the organ of Rosenmüller] are flexuous, of unequal calibre, and sometimes the seat of cystic or hydatidiform enlargements.

R. Barnes, Dis. of Women, p. 29.

hydatidinous (hi-dā-tid'i-nus), a. [hydatid + -ine + -ous.] Pertaining to or exhibiting one or more hydatids.

hydatiform (hi-dā-ti'fōrm), a. Same as hydatidiform.

hydatigenous (hi-dā-tij'e-nus), a. [hydatid + -genous.] Bearing or producing hydatids; as, a hydatigenous tapeworm.

Hydatigenous formations connected with the chorion.

T. S. Cobbold.

Hydatina (hi-dā-ti-nā), n. [NL., < Gr. hēdatēs, of water, watery, < hēdatēs (water).] 1. A genus of mollusks. Schumacher, 1817.—2. A genus of rotifers, typical of the family Hydatinidae, containing such species as H. senta, one of the best known of the wheel-animalcules. Ehrenberg, 1830. See cut under Rotifera.

Hydatina senta is a classical animal, because it was principally on this species that the illustrious Ehrenberg studied the anatomy of this group of animalcules. The broad body has only a very short foot-stalk, which is forked behind. The mouth is armed with two jaws and many teeth. There are no eye-specks whatsoever. The cuticle is delicate and soft.

Stand. Nat. Hist., I, 205.

Hydatinidae (hi-dā-tin'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Hydatina, 2, + -idae.] A family of schizotrochous rotifers, typified by the genus Hydatina. The trochal disk or wheel-organ is transverse and has ciliated prominences, the wreath is double, the trophi are malleate, and the foot is furcate. There are many genera besides Hydatina, such as Diglena, Notommatia, and Monocerca.

hydatitis (hi'dā-tis), n. A hydatid.

hydatism (hi'dā-tizm), n. [Gr. hēdatēs (water), + -ism.] In med., a sound produced by the motion of an effused fluid in some cavity of the body.

hydatoid (hi'dā-toid), a. and n. [Gr. hēdatēs, like water, < hēdatēs (water), + -oidēs, form.] I. a. Watery; aqueous; resembling water in any way; specifically, in anat., pertaining to the aqueous humor of the eye.

II. n. 1. The aqueous humor of the eye, as distinguished from the vitreous humor.—2. The investing membrane of the aqueous humor, as distinguished from the hyaloid investing the vitreous humor.

hyde¹, hyde², hyde³. An obsolete spelling of *hide*¹, *hide*², *hide*³.

hyderi, n. [F. hydre, a water-adder: see hydra.] A water-snake. Cotgrave.

Hydnei (hid'nē-i), n. pl. [NL. (Fries, 1836), < Hydnum + -ei.] An order of hymenomycetous fungi, typified by the genus Hydnum.

hydroid (hid'roid), a. [NL. Hydnum + Gr. eidos, form.] Resembling in form or structure the genus Hydnum.

Hydnum (hid'num), n. [NL., < Gr. hēdov, an edible fungus, prob. the truffle.] A genus of hymenomycetous fungi, type of the order Hydnei, characterized by having the hymenium inferior and spread over persistent spines or teeth which project from the pileus. The pileus is tough, or even coriaceous, in most of the species; but there are a few in which it is fleshy, and a small number, as H. repandum and H. coralloides, are described as edible. Two well-authenticated fossil species of Hydnum are known, from the Miocene deposits of Switzerland and Hesse.

hydra (hi'drā), n.; pl. hydras, hydræ (-drāz, -drē). [= F. hydre, < L. hydra, < Gr. hēdra, Ionic hēdra, the Lernean serpent, masc. hēdra, a water-snake, the ringed snake, Coluber natix, also a smaller kind of water-animal (= Lith. udra, a Russ. vidra, an otter, = OHG. oter = AS. oter, E. otter), < hēdra (hēdra), water: see otter, hydro-, and water.] 1. In Gr. myth., a monstrous serpent or dragon of the lake or marsh of Lerna in Argolis, represented as having nine heads, each of which, being cut off, was immediately succeeded by two new ones unless the wound was cauterized. The destruction of this monster was one of the twelve labors of Hercules.

Combat between Hercules and the Lernean Hydra. (From an archaic Greek amphora.)

Another king! they grow like Hydras' heads. Shak., 1 Hen. IV., v. 4.

Gorgons, and hydras, and chimeras dire.

Milton, P. L., II, 628.

Hence—2. Figuratively, multifarious evil; evil or misfortune arising from many sources and not easily to be surmounted.

And yet the hydra of my cares renews Still new-born sorrows of her fresh disdain.

Daniel, Sonnets to Delia, xv.

3. [cap.] An ancient southern constellation, representing a sea-serpent. It is of Babylonian origin, like most of the ancient constellations. It is bounded by the ancient constellations Canis Minor, Argo, Centaurus, Virgo, Corvus, Crater, Leo, and Cancer, and by the modern constellations Sextans and Monoceros (which separates it from Canis Major). It contains one star of the second magnitude, and about four hundred stars visible to the naked eye.

4. In zool.: (a) A venomous sea-snake; any one of the Hydrophidae of the Indian ocean. G. Cuvier. (b) In Hydrozoa:

(1) [cap.] A genus of freshwater polyps of very simple structure, typical of the family Hydridae. Among the species are H. viridis, H. fusca, and H. vulgaris. The body has the form of a cylindrical tube, composed of two fundamental layers, the ectoderm and endoderm, the former containing in one variety green granules identical with the chlorophyll of plants. The base is disk-shaped, and by it the animal can attach itself to any body, being capable of shifting its position. The mouth is surrounded by a circle of extremely contractile tentacles, by which the animal obtains its food, and which are richly endowed with the urticating organs or thread-cells common in the order.

The mouth opens immediately into the stomach, and there are no internal organs of any kind, and no anal orifice. Each part of a hydra divided into almost any number of fragments will develop into a fresh independent polypite. Reproduction is effected by gemmation as well as by means of ova and sperm-cells. The genus is said to have been first described by Trembley in 1774, but it is attributed by Agassiz to Linnaeus (1756), and the animal was described by A. van Leeuwenhoek in 1703. See cut under Hydrozoa.

The wonderful power which Hydra possesses of reproducing lost parts was first discovered and made known by Trembley, of Geneva, in the first half of the eighteenth century. He determined that even a small piece of Hydra vulgaris possesses the power, under favorable conditions, of developing into a perfect animal.

Stand. Nat. Hist., I, 76.

(2) An individual or a species of the genus Hydra. (3) The sexual bud or medusa of any hydroid hydrozoan: so called from its resemblance to a species of the genus Hydra.—5. A form of self-registering thermometer having a compound head or bulb to contain the spirits, with the object of increasing the surface exposed to the air, and thus making the instrument work with great rapidity. — Cor Hydrae. See cor. — Hydra tuba (pl. hydræ tubæ), in Hydrozoa, a stage in the development of certain Discophora; as a classifying name, a larval form of such aclephs, which was supposed to be a distinct animal. See scyphistoma.

Hydrachna (hi-drak'ng), n. [NL., < Gr. ὕδωρ (hōpō), water, & ἄχνη, foam, froth, chaff, the least bit (mite).] 1. A genus of acarids founded by Müller in 1781, at present restricted to those fresh-water mites in which the third joint of the a, adult (line shows natural size); b, mature larva, with pupa forming within (highly magnified).

palpi is the longest, the beak is as long as the palpi, and the mandibles have sharp blades. These mites are parasitic upon aquatic insects, attaching themselves to species of Nepa, Ranatra, Dytiscus, etc., during what may be called the pupa-stage. H. belostoma is often found upon bugs of the family Belostomatidae, especially Perithostoma avarantica.

2. A genus of water-beetles, of the family Dytiscidae, containing such as the European H. tarda. Fabricius, 1801.

Hydrachnidæ (hi-drak'ni-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Hydrachna + -idæ.] A family of aquatic Acarida, typified by the genus Hydrachna; the water-mites. The skeleton is composed of sclerites embedded in soft skin, and the body is apparently unsegmented. Most of the Hydrachnidæ inhabit fresh water, and many are parasitic on mollusks, fishes, and aquatic insects. Other genera besides Hydrachna are Atax, Hydrochoreutes, Limnochares, Pontarchina, and Thalassarachna, the two last named being marine. Also written Hydrachnidæ.

Hydracid (hi-dras'id), n. [hydr(ogen) + acid.] In chem., a halogen; an acid which does not contain oxygen.

Hydracrylic (hi-dra-kril'ik), a. [hydr(ogen) + acrylic.] Differing from acrylic by the addition of the elements of water, H_2O . — Hydracrylic acid, $C_3H_5O_3$, a monobasic lactic acid which when concentrated is a thick non-crystallizable acid syrup, and decomposes on heating into water and acrylic acid.

Hydractinia (hi-drak-tin'i-ā), n. [NL., < Gr. ὕδωρ (hōpō), water, & Actinia.] The typical genus of Hydractinidae. H. echinata is an example. Colonies of these polyps may be found growing on shells, forming a delicate white moss-like structure.

Hydractinidae (hi-drak-ti-ni'ī-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Hydractinia + -idæ.] A family of hydroid hydrozoans with free or rudimentary medusæ, of which the type is the genus Hydractinia. These hydroids form polyp colonies consisting of a dense mass of hydroids, whence simple or branched hydrocauli arise with three kinds of zooids: ordinary nutritive zooids with a verticil of filiform tentacles; reproductive zooids of each sex; and a third kind, of slender form, with out tentacles, but bearing endocells for the defense of the colony. The free medusæ have ocelli at the base of the tentacles, but no otoliths. The fertilized ova develop into planulas.

Hydradephaga (hi-dra-def'ā-gā), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of hydradephagus*; see hydradephagus.] The aquatic and adephagous beetles, comprising the two families Dytiscidae and Gyrinidae, in which the legs are fitted for swimming; distinguished from Geadephaga. MacLeay, 1825. The group is also called Hydrocanthari.

Hydradephagus (hi-dra-def'ā-gus), a. [NL. hydradephagus*, < Gr. ὕδωρ (hōpō), water, & ἀδρᾶφός, glutinous; see adephagus.] Aquatic and predatory, as certain beetles; specifically, pertaining to or having the characters of the Hydradephaga.

Hydræ, n. Latin plural of Hydra.

hydræmia, hydræmic. See hydreemia, hydreemia.

hydriform (hi-drā-fōrm), a. Same as hydriform.

hydragogic (hi-dra-go'ik), a. Having the character or effect of a hydragogue.

hydragogue (hi-drā-gog), n. [F. hydragogue, < LL. hydragogus, conducting water, a plant so called, < Gr. ὕδωρ (hōpō), water, & ἀγᾶγος, leading, < ἀγᾶγ, lead, conduct; see agent.] In med.: (a) An active purgative, as jalap, which produces a great flux from the intestinal membrane, and consequently gives rise to very watery stools. (b) A remedy believed to be capable of drawing off serum effused into any part of the body, as a cathartic of the above class or a diuretic.

hydragogic, n. [= Sp. hidragogia, < Gr. ὕδωρ (hōpō), water, & ἀγᾶγος, leading, < ἀγᾶγ, lead, conduct; see agent.] The art of constructing aqueducts, or of conducting water through channels.

Hydragogie demonstrateth the possible leading of water by nature's law, and by artificial help, from any head (being a spring standing or running water) to any other place assigned. Dee, Pref. to Euclid (1570).

hydra-headed (hi-drā-hed'ed), a. Having numerous heads, like the Lernæan Hydra; hence, difficult of extirpation; self-renewing; springing up again after suppression, as abuses, vices, and the like.

Never Hydra-headed wilfulness
So soon did lose his seat, and all at once,
As in this king. Shak., Hen. V., i. 1.

Hydralgæ (hi-dral'jē), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. ὕδωρ (hōpō), water, & L. alga, seaweed.] Same as Hydrophyta.

hydramnios (hi-dram'ni-os), n. [NL., < Gr. ὕδωρ (hōpō), water, & ἄμνιον, amnion.] In pathol., an excessive accumulation of liquor amnii. See liquor and amnion.

Hydrangea (hi-dran'jē-ā; properly hi-dran-jē'ā), n. [NL., < Gr. ὕδωρ (hōpō), water, & ἄγχιον, vessel; see angio.] 1. A genus of shrubs or herbs, of the natural order Saxifragæ, type of the tribe Hydrangeæ, containing about 33 species, natives of Asia and America, characterized by having the ovary inferior, 4 or 5 valvate pet-

Hydrangea arborescens. a, b, fertile and sterile flowers; c, fruit cut transversely; d, fruit entire.

als, 4 or 5 styles, free or connate at base, the fruit a capsule, and the leaves deciduous or persistent. The common hydrangea, H. hortensis, is a native of China. It was introduced into England by Sir J. Banks in 1790. It is a favorite for the beauty and size of its flowers, which form immense globular clusters, blue, pink, or white. H. arborescens, the wild American hydrangea, was introduced into European cultivation from Virginia in 1736; it is not much cultivated in the United States. H. quercifolia, the oak-leaved hydrangea, is wild from Georgia south, and is hardy at the north in cultivation. The genus is found in a fossil state, five extinct species having been described from the Miocene of Europe. Sometimes spelled Hydrangia.

2. [l. c.] A plant of this genus.

hydrangead (hi-dran'jē-ad), n. [NL. < Hydrangea + -ad.] A plant belonging to Lindley's order Hydrangeaceæ, now placed in the order Saxifragæ, tribe Hydrangeæ.

Hydrangeæ (hi-dran'jē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (A. P. de Candolle, 1830), < Hydrangea + -æ.] A tribe of plants of the natural order Saxifragæ. They are shrubs or trees with opposite exstipulate leaves, petals often valvate, stamens often epigynous, and the ovary in most of the genera 3- to 5-celled.

Street Fire-hydrants.

hydrant (hi'drant), n. [Gr. ὕδωρ (hōpō), water, & -ant.] An apparatus for drawing water directly from a main (particularly from a main in a street), consisting of a hollow cylinder provided with one or more nozzles to which hose may be attached, or with a spout, or the like, and usually with a valve and pipe for the escape of the excess of water, in order to guard against freezing. The common form of a fire-hydrant is that of an upright pipe standing about two feet above the ground, as on the edge of a sidewalk, with a nozzle to which the filling-hose or suction-pipe of a fire-engine can be attached. The valve is below, next to the main, and is so arranged that the closing of it opens the waste-pipe and frees the hydrant from water. See cut in preceding column.

hydranth (hi'dranth), n. [Gr. ὕδρα, 4, + Gr. ἄνθος, flower.] A polypite; the fundamental structural element in Hydrozoa. It consists (with various modifications) of a sac having at one end an ingestive or oral aperture leading into a digestive cavity. The walls of the sac are formed of at least two cellular membranes, inner and outer, or endoderm and ectoderm, which have the morphological valence respectively of the epithelium and epidermis of the higher animals. Between these membranes a third layer, the mesoderm, may be developed. See also cuts under Campularia and Diphydia.

In an early stage of its existence every hydrozoan is represented by a single hydranth, but, in the majority of the Hydrozoa, new hydranths are developed from that first formed by a process of gemmation or fission. Huxley.

hydrapult (hi'dra-pult), n. See hydrapult.

Hydrarchus (hi-drār'kus), n. [NL., < Gr. ὕδωρ (hōpō), water, & ἄρχος, ruler, < ἀρχεω, rule.] A genus of fossil cetaceans: same as Basilosaurus. Also Hydrarchos. Koch.

hydrargillite (hi-drār'ji-lit), n. [Gr. ὕδωρ (hōpō), water, & ἀργίλος, white clay; see argillaceous.] A crystalline variety of gibbsite, a hydrous oxide of aluminium.

hydrargiret, n. See hydrargyre.

hydrargochlorid, hydrargochloride (hi-drār-go-klo'rid, -rid or -rid), n. [hydrarg(um) + chlorid.] A double chlorid of mercury and some other base: as, hydrargochlorid of ammonium.

hydrargyralt, a. [hydrargyrum + -alt.] Mercurial. Bailey.

hydrargyrate (hi-drār'ji-rāt), a. [hydrargyrum + -atē.] Of or pertaining to mercury.

hydrargyre, n. [= Sp. hydrargyro = Eg. hydrargyro = It. idrargiro; < L. hydrargyrum, quicksilver; see hydrargyrum.] Quicksilver; mercury. Also spelled hydrargire.

Th' hidden lone that now-a-days doth holde
The Steel and Loadstone, Hydrargyre and Golde,
Th' Amber and straw.

Sylvester, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, ii, The Furies.

hydrargyria (hi-drār-jir'ī-ā), n. [NL., < hydrargyrum.] Same as hydrargyriasis.

hydrargyriasis (hi-drār-jir'ī-ā-sis), n. [NL., < hydrargyrum + -iasis.] In pathol., mercurial poisoning; a morbid condition produced by the introduction of mercury into the animal system. Also called hydrargyriasm, hydrargyrosis, hydrargyria, hydrargysm.

hydrargyric (hi-drār-jir'ik), a. [hydrargyrum + -ic.] Pertaining to hydrargyrum, or mercury; mercurial.

hydrargyrisim (hi-drār-jir'izim), n. [hydrargyrum + -ism.] Same as hydrargyriasis.

hydrargyrum (hi-drār'ji-rum), n. [NL., < L. hydrargyrum, < Gr. ὕδωρ (hōpō), water, & ἀργυρος, silver; < ἀργεω, fused silver; < ἄργος (hōpō), water, & ἀργυρος, silver; see argent.] Chemical symbol, Hg. Quicksilver; mercury. See mercury.

hydrargysm (hi-drār'jizm), n. Same as hydrargyriasis.

hydrarthrosis (hi-drār-thrō'sis), n. [NL., < Gr. ὕδωρ (hōpō), water, & ἄρθρσις, a jointing; see arthrosis.] In pathol., the accumulation of serous liquid in a joint-cavity.

hydrarthrus (hi-drār'thrus), n. [NL., < Gr. ὕδωρ (hōpō), water, & ἄρθρον, joint.] Same as hydrarthrosis.

Hydraspidæ (hi-dras'pi-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Hydraspis + -idæ.] Same as Hydraspididae.

Hydraspididæ (hi-dras-pid'ī-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Hydraspis + -idæ.] A family of tortoises, typified by the genus Hydraspis. The head is depressed and covered with small polygonal plates, and the flat skull has a distinct bony crown with a more or less elevated occipital arch. The species inhabit South America and Australia. In Cope's system of classification the family is limited to pleurodrous tortoises with three phalanges to most of the digits, and no zygotomic but a parastomatoid arch.

Hydraspis (hi-dras'pis), n. [NL. (Bell), < Gr. ὕδωρ (hōp), water, + ασπίς, a shield.] The typical genus of Hydraspididæ, containing such turtles as the Brazilian H. maximiliani.

hydrastine (hi-dras'tin), n. [< Hydrastis + -ine]. 1. An alkaloid found in the root of goldenseal, Hydrastis Canadensis. It is crystalline, odorless, and, on account of its insolubility, nearly tasteless. Also hydrastia.—2. A medicine used by eclectic physicians, which is a mixture of hydrastine, berberine, and resin. It is not to be confounded with the alkaloid hydrastine. U. S. Dispensatory.

Hydrastis (hi-dras'tis), n. [NL. (said to allude to the active properties of the juice), irreg. < Gr. ὕδωρ (hōp), water, + δρασ, act: see drastic.] A genus of North American plants, of the natural order Ranunculaceæ. The only known species is H. Canadensis, a small perennial herb, with a thick knotted rootstock, a single radical leaf, and a simple 2-leaved hairy stem which bears a solitary greenish-white flower. It is sometimes used in dyeing, and gives a beautiful yellow color; hence the common names yellowroot, orange-root, goldenseal, and yellow puccoon.

hydration (hi-dra'ti-shon), n. [< hydrate + -ation.] Same as hydration.

hydrate (hi'drat), n. [= F. hydrate; as Gr. ὕδωρ (hōp), water, + -ate.] In chem., a compound of a class which may be regarded as formed upon the same type as water, or by the substitution of a metallic atom, or a basic radical, for one of the atoms of hydrogen in water: for example, HOH, water; KOH, potassium hydrate; NH₄OH, ammonium hydrate.—Croton-chloral hydrate. See croton.

hydrate (hi'drat), v. t.; pret. and pp. hydrated, pp. hydrating. [= F. hydrater; as Gr. ὕδωρ (hōp), water, + -ate.] 1. To combine or impregnate with water.—2. To form into a hydrate.

To hydrate the milk and cane-sugar.

Hueppe, Bacteriological Investigations (trans.), p. 96.

Hydrated copper oxid. See copper.

hydration (hi-dra'ti-shon), n. [< hydrate + -ion.] The process of combining or impregnating with water, or the resulting condition. Also hydratation.

The truths he [Prof. Graham] established respecting the hydration of compounds, the transpiration and the diffusion of liquids, . . . are all of them cardinal truths.

H. Spencer, Study of Sociol., p. 226.

The solidity of the crust of the earth is limited by temperature and pressure under conditions of chemical constitution and hydration.

Science, III. 511.

hydraulic (hi-drá'lik), a. [< F. hydraulique = Sp. hidráulico = Pg. hidráulico = It. idraulico (cf. D. G. hydraulisch = Dan. Sv. hydraulisk), < L. hydraulicus, < Gr. ὕδραυλος, pertaining to the water-organ, < ὕδραυλος, also ὕδραυλος, a water-organ invented by an Egyptian named Ctesibius, lit. a water-pipe, < ὕδωρ (hōp), water, + αἰδός, a tube, pipe: see auletic.] Pertaining or relating to fluids in motion, or to hydraulics. See hydraulics.—Hydraulic balance, a regulator or governor for a water-wheel.—Hydraulic bear, a form of hydraulic press especially designed for punching rivet-holes or shearing iron.—Hydraulic belt, a water-lifting device consisting of an endless belt fitted with caps or buckets, like the lifter of a grain-elevator. The lower part works on a wheel submerged in the water, and the buckets discharge their loads as they turn over an upper wheel.—Hydraulic block, in a repairing-dock, a hydraulic lifting-press used as a substitute for a building-block under the keel of a vessel. It is adjustable as to height, and is used in straightening hogged or sagged vessels.—Hydraulic blower, a form of bellows operated by a hydraulic motor.—Hydraulic brush, a brush at the end of a long handle, the handle serving as a pipe to convey water to the brush from a hose, or acting as an aqueduct or syringe.—Hydraulic buffer, a device for checking the recoil of a cannon. A piston-rod working in a cylinder filled with liquid is fastened to the port carriage. The liquid escapes through holes in the piston-head, but so slowly that it hinders the motion of the piston, thus acting as a buffer.—Hydraulic cane, a rude form of pump, consisting of a tube having a valve opening inward at the lower end. By plunging the lower end in water and moving it rapidly up and down, the water can be made to rise in the tube.—Hydraulic cement. See cement.—Hydraulic compressor, in a gun-carriage, a device to prevent the recoil of the piece, by receiving the impact upon a piston which forces liquid through holes in a diaphragm contained in a chamber.—Hydraulic condenser, in gas-manuf., a chamber in which gas from the retorts is cooled.—Hydraulic crane, an apparatus for the raising or hoisting of loads on the principle of the hydraulic press.—Hydraulic dock, a floating dock. See cut under dock.—Hydraulic elevator. See elevator.—Hydraulic engine, a motor employing water under pressure as the source of power.—Hydraulic engineering, a special branch of civil engineering concerned with the construction of water-works and hydraulic machinery, and the improvement and control of streams, navigable waters, and canals.—Hydraulic gage, a kind of manometer used to record the pressure in a hydraulic press, pump, or engine.—Hydraulic in- dicator, a gage to indicate the pressure of water.—

Hydraulic jack, a jack or lifting-apparatus operated by means of some liquid, usually oil, acting against a piston or plunger, the pressure on the liquid being produced by a force-pump.—Hydraulic lime, a species of lime that hardens in water, or which can be used for making hydraulic cement.—Hydraulic main, in gas-works, a large iron pipe partly filled with water, into which all the pipes bringing the raw gas from the retorts enter, dipping below the water to form a seal. The main serves as the first purifier of the gas for use, and also to convey the crude gas to the condenser.—Hydraulic mill, a form of crushing-mill in which sugar-cane is steam-pressed.—Hydraulic mining, a method of attacking the gravel or auriferous detritus and bringing it into the sluices, invented and until recently extensively employed in California. It has also been introduced into other gold regions, notably those of Australia. The essential feature of the method is that the gravel is broken up and washed down into the head of the sluice by one or more powerful jets of water, thrown upon the bank and used in such a way as to furnish a current of sufficient velocity to carry the Hydraulic Mining.

debris down into the sluice. The volume of water used is often very large, and the delivery from the pipe takes place with great velocity, the water being under a heavy head. The diameter of the stream as it issues from the pipe is sometimes as much as 6 or 8 inches, and the pressure from 100 to 200 feet.—Hydraulic mortar. See mortar.—Hydraulic motor, a motor driven by water-power.—Hydraulic organ, an old form of organ in which water was used to regulate the pressure of the air. Also called hydraulic organ.—Hydraulic pivot, in mach., a device by which a film of water is introduced below the end of a vertical axis to receive its weight, and relieve friction. Also called liquid bearing. E. H. Knight.—Hydraulic press, a press operated by the pressure of a liquid, under the action either of gravity or of some mechanical device, as a force-pump. It depends on the law of hydrostatics that any pressure upon a body of water is distributed equally in all directions throughout the whole mass, whatever its shape. In the more common forms the pressure of a piston upon a body of water in a cylinder of small area is distributed through pipes or openings to a piston of larger area, the statical force being thus multiplied in the direct ratio of the areas of the pistons. Thus, if the diameter of the small piston A is one inch and of the larger piston C in cylinder B is one foot, the area of C will be 144 times that of A; and if a load of one ton is applied to A, C will exert an upward statical force of 144 tons. The press properly so called is simply a frame placed over the large plunger so that its upward thrust can be exerted against any material held in the frame.

Section of Force-pump, Plunger, etc., of Hydraulic Press.

Since the power of a hydraulic press can be exerted in any direction, it is used as the basis of a great number of machines, as the hydraulic block, crane, jack, dock, hoist, lift, punch, rail-bender, and shears, and for the pressing of paper and other materials. The pressure is applied to the water in the smaller cylinder by the simple weight of a column of water, as in the hydrostatic bellows, or by a weight placed on the piston by means of a lever or a screw, etc. Also called hydrostatic press and Bramah's press.—Hydraulic ram. (a) A self-contained and automatic pump operated partly by the pressure of a column of water in a pipe, and partly by the vis viva or living force acquired by intermittent motion of the column. The simplest form is shown in the figure. A is the supply-pipe; E, the source of supply; B, a hollow ball-valve seating upwardly, of less diameter than the inside diameter of A, and having a specific gravity enough greater than that of the water to enable it to overcome the pressure of the water in A, and fall away from its seat when the water is at rest. D is an air-chamber connected at the bottom with A, and near the bottom with a much smaller discharge-pipe, F. C is a check-valve. Water at first flows freely through A, by the ball-valve, and out at E. The column in A soon acquires velocity and consequent living force competent to lift the ball-valve to its seat, abruptly stopping the flow at B; but the living force of the column in A is now sufficient to overcome the back pressure upon, and lift, the valve C, and to force a part of the water from A into the chamber D. The discharge-pipe, F, being much smaller than A, the flow into D is temporarily much larger than the discharge from F. The confined air in D is therefore compressed. This pressure soon becomes sufficient to bring the liquid column in A to rest. The valve C then closes, but the pressure of the air in D still acts with diminishing force to expel water from D through F. The valve B now drops away from its seat, which again begins the series of operations, and so the action is indefinitely repeated. The water escaping from B is wasted. The machine can be used to raise water to a height many times greater than the available head. In another form this machine is adapted to draw water from a source independent of that which supplies the power for operating it. (b) The larger or lifting piston of a hydraulic press.—Hydraulic valve, an inverted cup which is lowered over the upturned open end of a pipe, the edge of the cup being submerged in water, forming a water-seal, and closing the pipe against the passage of air or gases. E. H. Knight.

Hydraulic Ram.

hydraulic (hi-drá'li-ka), a. [< hydraulic + -al.] Same as hydraulic. [Rare.]

I look not on a human body as on a watch or a hand-mill, . . . but as an hydraulic, or rather hydraulic-pneumatic engine, that consists not only of solid and stable parts, but of fluids, and those in organic motion.

Boyle, Works, p. 232.

hydraulically (hi-drá'li-ka-li), adv. By hydraulic means; according to hydraulic principles.

hydraulician (hi-drá'lish'an), n. [< hydraulic + -ian.] One who is skilled in hydraulics.

hydraulicity (hi-drá'lis'i-ti), n. [< hydraulic + -ity.] The qualities necessary for making hydraulic cement, or that kind of mortar which will harden under water; the property of setting under water.

hydraulicking (hi-drá'li-king), n. [< hydraulic (k) + -ing.] Hydraulic mining. See hydraulic.

hydraulicion (hi-drá'li-kon), n. [< Gr. ὑδραυλικόν (see, ὕδραυλον), the hydraulic organ: see hydraulic.] Same as hydraulic organ (which see, under hydraulic).

hydraulics (hi-drá'liks), n. [Pl. of hydraulic: see -ics.] That branch of engineering science which treats of the motion of liquids, the laws by which it is regulated, and the application of these principles to machinery, marine engineering, etc.

hydraulist (hi-drá'list), n. [< hydraulic (ic) + -ist.] One who is skilled in hydraulics.

Meton (the astronomer and hydraulist).

C. O. Müller, Manual of Archæol. (trans.), § 111.

hydrazine (hi'dra-zin), n. [< hydr (ogen) + az (ote) (i) + -ine.] 1. Diamide, H₂N₂, a colorless stable gas, soluble in water, having a peculiar odor and a strongly alkaline reaction.

—2. The general name of a class of bodies derived from this gas by replacing one or more of its hydrogen atoms by a compound radical: as, ethyl hydrazine, C₂H₅N₂H₃.—hydremlia, hydremia (hi-dre'mi-ä), n. [NL. < Gr. ὕδωρ (hōp), water, + αἷμα, blood.] A watery state of the blood; an excess of water in the blood.

hydremic, hydræmic (hi-drem'ik), a. [< hydremia, hydremia, + -ic.] Pertaining to or of the nature of hydremia; affected with hydremia: as, a hydremic state of the blood.

hydrecephal (hi-dren'se-fal), n. [< hydrencephalus.] Same as hydrecephalon.

hydrecephalocèle (hi-dren-sef'a-lō-sel), n. [< Gr. ὕδωρ (hōp), water, + ἐγκέφαλος, brain, + κῆλη, tumor.] 1. A cephalocèle in which the sac contains serous liquid and brain-substance.—2. A monster having this deformity. Dunghison.—hydrecephaloid (hi-dren-sef'a-lōid), a. [< Gr. ὕδωρ (hōp), water, + ἐγκέφαλος, brain, + εἶδος, form.] Same as hydrecephaloid.

hydrecephalon (hi-dren-sef'a-lon), n. A hydrocephalous brain; a case of hydrocephalus. Also hydrecephal.

hydrocephalus (hi-dren-sef'a-lus), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑδρ (hōp), water, + κεφαλή (kephalē), brain: see encephalon.] Same as hydrocephalus, 1.

hydroterocoele (hi-dren'ter-ō-sēl), n. [< Gr. ὑδρ (hōp), water, + τεροειδής (teroeidēs), intestine, + κύστη (kystē), tumor.] Intestinal hernia the sac of which incloses water.

hydia (hi'dri-ā), n.; pl. hydriæ (-ē). [L., < Gr. ὑδρία (hōp-ia), a water-pot, < ὑδρ (hōp), water: see hydro-.] In archæol., a large Greek vase, used especially for carrying water. It has a capacious body, with a narrow mouth and usually a broad rim, and three handles, one at the back extending above the rim, and a smaller one on each side.

hydriad (hi'dri-ad), n. [< Gr. ὑδρία (hōp-ia), of the water (ὑδρ (hōp), water-nymphs), < ὑδρ (hōp), water.] In myth., a water-nymph.

hydriæ (hi'dri-ē), n. pl. [L.] 1. Plural of hydia.—2. [cap.] [NL.] A group of lepidopterous insects. Hübner, 1816.

hydric (hi'drik), a. [< hydr (ogen) + -ic.] Pertaining to, combined with, or containing hydrogen.

hydrid¹, hydride (hi'drid, -drid or -drid), n. [< hydr (ogen) + -id¹, -ide¹.] In chem., a substance consisting of hydrogen combined with an element, or with some compound radical which plays the part of an element: as, phosphorus hydride; amyl hydride.

hydrid² (hi'drid), n. A fresh-water polyp of the family Hydriæ; a hydra.

Hydriæ (hi'dri-ē), n. pl. [NL., < Hydra + -iæ.] 1. A family of hydrozoans, typified by the fresh-water genus Hydra, alone representing in some systems the suborder Euletherozoa, of the order Hydrozoa. They are solitary polyps of simplest structure, maturing the sexual products in the gastric wall, and also propagating asexually by budding or fission. The process of budding is similar to that which takes place in colonial hydromedusans, only the buds become detached so that the polyp remains solitary; therefore Claus and others consider the Hydriæ simply as a family of Hydromedusæ. See cut under Hydrozoa.

2. In Gray's classification, a group of serpents, containing the venomous sea-serpents or Hydrophidæ, with many harmless snakes belonging properly to several different families.

hydride, n. See hydrid¹.

hydriform (hi'dri-fōrm), a. [< NL. hydriformis, < hydra, q. v., + L. forma, shape.] Relating to or resembling a hydra, or one of the Hydrozoa; hydroid. Also hydroform.

hydriodate (hi'dri-ō-dāt), n. [< hydriod (ic) + -ate¹.] A salt of hydriodic acid.

hydriodic (hi'dri-ō-dik), a. [< hydr (ogen) + iod (ine) + -ic.] Produced by the combination of hydrogen and iodine.—Hydriodic acid, HI, a colorless gas formed by combining hydrogen and iodine, having a suffocating odor and fuming in the air. Its compounds with bases are called iodides.

hydro- [< L. hydro- (> It. idro- = Sp. hidro- = Pg. F. hydro-), < Gr. ὑδρ (hōp), before a vowel ὑδρ (hōp), the usual combining form (ὑδρ (hōp), being the usual derivative form) of ὑδρ (hōp), water: see water.] An element in many compound words of Greek origin, meaning 'water.' In chemical compounds other than hydrogen it usually represents hydrogen.

hydroa (hi-drō-ā), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑδρ (hōp), water, + φύω = L. ovum, egg.] In pathol., a name of certain forms of vesicular or bulbous eruptions, usually regarded as forms of pemphigus, also of forms of herpes and herpes iris, and of sudamina.

hydroadenitis (hi-drō-ad-e-ni'tis), n. [NL. (prop. hydradenitis), < Gr. ὑδρ (hōp), water, + NL. adenitis, q. v.] In pathol., inflammation of the sweat-glands.

hydroadipsia (hi-drō-a-dip'si-ā), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑδρ (hōp), water, + NL. adipsia, q. v.] In pathol., a lack of thirst.

hydrobarometer (hi-drō-ba-rom'e-tēr), n. [< Gr. ὑδρ (hōp), water, + E. barometer.] An instrument for determining the depth of the sea by the pressure of the superincumbent water.

Hydrobata (hi-drōb'a-tā), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑδρ (hōp), water, + βάτης (bātēs), one that treads, < βαίω (baíō), go, walk.] A genus of birds, the dippers, giving name to the family Hydrobatidæ: a synonym of Cinclus. Vieillot, 1816.

Hydrobatæ (hi-drōb'a-tēz), n. [NL.: see Hydrobata.] 1. Same as Hydrobata. Boie, 1822.—2. The typical genus of water-bugs of the family Hydrobatidæ. Erichson, 1848.

Hydrobatidæ (hi-drō-bat'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Hydrobata + -idæ.] 1. A family of turdoid passerine birds, the dippers or water-ouzzels, named from the genus Hydrobata: a synonym of Cinclidæ. See cuts under Cinclidæ and dipper.—2. A family of heteropterous insects, of elongate form, with the head sunken in the thorax up to the prominent rounded eyes, reflexed rostrum, 4-jointed antennæ, and inconspicuous ocelli if any. They live on the surface of the water, and are collectively called water-striders. hydrobenzamide (hi-drō-ben'za-mid or -mid), n. [< hydro (gen) + benzamide.] A compound (C₂₁H₁₉N₂) obtained by the action of aqueous ammonia on bitter-almond oil.

hydrobiosis (hi-drō-bi-ō'sis), n. [< Gr. ὑδρ (hōp), water, + βίος (bios), life, + -osis.] The development of living organisms, as bacteria, in fluid media; the conditions of life of such organisms.

hydrobiotite (hi-drō-bi-ō-tit), n. [< Gr. ὑδρ (hōp), water, + βιότις (biosis), a hydrated biotite, related to the vermiculites.

Hydrobius (hi-drō'bi-us), n. [NL. (Leach, 1817), < Gr. ὑδρ (hōp), water, + βίος (bios), life.] A genus of water-beetles of the family Hydrophilidæ, having 9-jointed antennæ and slender palpi, with well-compressed and ciliated hind tarsi. It is a large and wide-spread group, including 16 North American species.

hydroboracite (hi-drō-bō-rā-sit), n. [< Gr. ὑδρ (hōp), water, + borax (-ac) + -ite².] A mineral of white color, resembling fibrous and foliated gypsum. It is hydrated calcium and magnesium borate.

hydrobranch (hi-drō-brangk), n. One of the Hydrobranchiata.

Hydrobranchia (hi-drō-brang'ki-ā), n. pl. Same as Hydrobranchiata.

Hydrobranchiata (hi-drō-brang-ki-ā'tā), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. ὑδρ (hōp), water, + βράγχια (brāngchia), gills, + -ata.] In Lamarck's latest classification, a division of gastropods, distinguished from Pneumobranchiata, and containing species which breathe water only. The section imperfectly corresponds to the nudibranchiata, inferobranchiata, and tectibranchiata of Cuvier.

hydrobranchiate (hi-drō-brang'ki-āt), a. Pertaining to or having the characters of the Hydrobranchiata.

hydrobromate (hi-drō-brō'māt), n. [< hydrobromic + -ate¹.] A salt of hydrobromic acid: same as bromide. Also called bromhydrate.

hydrobromic (hi-drō-brō'mik), n. [< hydro (gen) + brom (ine) + -ic.] Composed of hydrogen and bromine.—Hydrobromic acid, HB, an acid prepared by bringing phosphorus and bromine together with a little water. It is a colorless gas, having a strong suffocating odor, fuming in the air, and very soluble in water. Its salts are called bromides. The acid is somewhat used in medicine as a substitute for the bromides.

Hydrocampa (hi-drō-kam'pā), n. [NL. (Latreille, 1825), < Gr. ὑδρ (hōp), water, + κάμπτω (kāmpō), caterpillar.] The typical genus of moths of the for themselves cases of two oval bits of leaf. The genus is widely distributed in most parts of the world, though the species are few and none are North American. H. nymphaea and H. stagnata are two British species, known as china-marks. Also Hydrocampa.

Hydrocampiæ (hi-drō-kam'pi-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Hydrocampa + -iæ.] A family of pyralid moths, typified by the genus Hydrocampa: so called from the aquatic habits of the larvæ.

Hydrocanthari (hi-drō-kan'thā-rī), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. ὑδρ (hōp), water, + κάνθαρος (kāntharos), a beetle.] In Latreille's system of entomological classification, the swimmers; the third tribe of pentamerous Coleoptera, including the aquatic carnivorous beetles, of the old genera Dytiscus and Gyrinus. It thus includes the modern families Dytiscidæ and Gyrinidæ, and is identical with the modern group Hydradeapha. Also Hydrocanthariæ, Hydrocantharidæ.

hydrocarbide (hi-drō-kār'bid or -bid), n. Same as hydrocarbon.

hydrocarbon (hi-drō-kār'bon), n. [< hydro (gen) + carbon.] A compound of hydrogen and carbon; the general name of any compound consisting of hydrogen and carbon alone. The hydrocarbons are an exceedingly large and important group of compounds, and with their derivatives form the subject-matter of organic chemistry.—Hydrocarbon black, burner, engine, furnace, etc. See the nouns.

hydrocarbonaceous (hi-drō-kār-bō-nā'shius), a. [< hydrocarbon + -aceous.] Consisting of or having the nature of hydrocarbon.

In order to obtain the highest illuminating power of a flame in which hydrocarbonaceous compounds are undergoing combustion, the regulation of the supply of air is essential. Lommel, Light (trans.), p. 5.

hydrocarbonate (hi-drō-kār'bō-nāt), n. [< hydrocarbon + -ate¹.] Carbureted hydrogen gas.

hydrocarbonic (hi-drō-kār-bō'n'ik), a. [< hydrocarbon + -ic.] Pertaining to or having the nature of hydrocarbon.

hydrocarbonous (hi-drō-kār'bō-nus), a. [< hydrocarbon + -ous.] Same as hydrocarbonic.

This hydrocarbonous pyrocone is closely surrounded or enveloped by gyrating, strongly-heated atmospheric air. W. A. Ross, Blowpipe, p. 71.

hydrocarburet (hi-drō-kār'bū-ret), n. [< hydro (gen) + carburet, q. v.] Carbureted hydrogen gas.

hydrocardia (hi-drō-kār'di-ā), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑδρ (hōp), water, + καρδιά = E. heart.] Same as hydropericardium.

hydrocastorite (hi-drō-kas'tor-it), n. [< Gr. ὑδρ (hōp), water, + castorite, see castor³.] A hydrated silicate of aluminium and calcium, derived from the alteration of petalite from Elba.

hydrocauli, n. Plural of hydrocaulus.

hydrocauline (hi-drō-kā'lin), a. [< hydrocaulus + -ine¹.] Pertaining to or having the character of a hydrocaulus.

hydrocaulus (hi-drō-kā'lus), n.; pl. hydrocaulæ (-ī). [NL., < Gr. ὑδρ (hōp), water, + καυλός (kaulós), a stem.] In zool., the main stem of the ctenosarc of a hydrozoan.

hydrocele (hi'drō-sēl), n. [= F. hydrocèle, < L. hydrocele, < Gr. ὑδρ (hōp), water, + κύστη (kystē), tumor.] In pathol., a collection of serous fluid in the cavity of the tunica vaginalis of the testis. Dunglison.

hydro-cellulose (hi-drō-sel'ū-lōs), n. See the extract.

Cotton completely disorganised by acid, and obtained as a fine powder, seems to contain no molecule of water, more than ordinary cellulose, and the substance thus produced has been termed hydro-cellulose.

Hammel, Dyeing of Textile Fabrics (1886), p. 7.

hydrocephalic (hi'drō-sē-fal'ik or hi-drō-sēf'a'lik), a. [< hydrocephalus + -ic.] Pertaining to or exhibiting hydrocephalus.

hydrocephaloid (hi-drō-sēf'a-lōid), a. [< hydrocephalus + -oid.] Resembling hydrocephalus. Also hydrocephaloid.—Hydrocephaloid disease, condition of scrofulous or coma developed occasionally in children in conditions of exhaustion. It appears to depend on cerebral anemia.

hydrocephalous (hi-drō-sēf'a-lus), a. [< NL. hydrocephalus: see hydrocephalus.] Same as hydrocephaloid.

hydrocephalus (hi-drō-sēf'a-lus), n. [= F. hydrocéphale = Sp. hidrocéfalo = Pg. hidrocéfalo < NL. hydrocephalus, < Gr. ὑδρ (hōp), water, + κεφαλή (kephalē), head.] 1. In pathol., an accumulation of serous fluid within the cranial cavity, either in the subdural space (external hydrocephalus) or in the ventricles (internal hydrocephalus). Acute hydrocephalus is usually, and apparently always, due to meningitis. (See meningitis.) Chronic hydrocephalus may be due to atrophy of the brain, to pressure on the vena cava by tumors or inflammatory products, or to other causes. Also hydrocephalus, hydrocranium.

2. [cap.] In zool., a genus of trilobites. Barande, 1846.

Hydia, in the Museum of Fine Arts, Boston, Massachusetts.

Hydrocampa genitalis. (About twice natural size.)

hydrocerusite (hi-drō-ser'ŏ-sīt), n. [< Gr. ὑδωρ (hōp-), water, + cerusite, q. v.] A basic lead carbonate occurring in thin hexagonal plates.

Hydrocharidae (hi' drō-ka-rīd' ē-ē), n. pl. [< Hydrocharis (-id-) + -ae.] A natural order of monocotyledonous aquatic herbs, with dioecious or polygamous regular flowers on scape-like peduncles from a spathe, and simple or double floral envelopes, which in the fertile flowers are united into a tube, and cohere with the 1- to 3-celled ovary; stamens 3 to 12, distinct or monadelphous; stigmas 3 or 6; fruit ripening under water, indehiscent, and many-seeded. This, the frogbit family, embraces 14 genera and about 40 species, which are widely distributed in the warm and temperate parts of the world, in ponds, lakes, and ditches. Also written Hydrocharaceae (Lindley), Hydrocharaceae (Reichenbach), Hydrochariceae (Dumortier), Hydrocharidaceae (Ventant), and Hydrocharidaceae (Léunis).

Hydrocharitaceae (hi-drōk' a-ris), n. [NL. (Linnaeus), < Gr. ὑδροχαρίς, delighting in water, + ὑδωρ (hōp-), water, + χαίρειν, delight, rejoice.] A genus of monocotyledonous plants, of the natural order Hydrocharitaceae, having floating stems, with floating tufts of radical leaves, peduncles, and submerged roots. The peduncles of the male plant are short, 2- or 3-flowered; the female spathe is sessile among the leaves; stamens 3 to 12; styles 6 with 2-claft stigmas. H. Moros-rance, the frogbit, the only species, is dispersed over Europe and northern and central Asia. The form appears to have been more abundant in Miocene times, four or five extinct species occurring in that formation in Europe.

Hydrochelidon (hi-drō-kel' i-don), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑδωρ (hōp-), water, + χελιδών, a swallow.] A genus of Sterninae, or terns, known as black terns or short-tailed sea-swallows. It contains several species of small size, with short and emarginate or moderately forked tail, very long and ample wings, and small feet with deeply emarginate webs. These birds undergo changes of plumage unusual in the group, the adults being chiefly black or blackish. There are several species, found in all parts of the world, such as the common black tern of Europe and America, H. lariformis, or fissipes, or nigra; the white-winged black tern, H. leucophaea; and the whiskered black tern, H. hybriida. Boie, 1822.

hydrochinon (hi-drō-kī' non), n. Same as hydroquinone.

hydrochlorate (hi-drō-klo' rāt), n. [< hydrochloric + -ate.] A salt of hydrochloric acid.

hydrochloric (hi-drō-klo' rik), a. [< hydro(gen) + chlor(in) + -ic.] Pertaining to or compounded of chlorine and hydrogen gas. Also chlorhydric, chlorohydric, chlorydric.—Hydrochloric acid, HCl, a colorless gas having a suffocating odor and an acid taste. It is irrespirable, and not a supporter of combustion. It is extremely soluble in water, and its solution forms the hydrochloric acid or muriatic acid of commerce. It is one of the most important acids commercially, and is made as a by-product of the soda-ash manufacture. Its salts, the chlorides, are universally distributed in nature and extensively used in the arts. Also called hydrogen chloride.—Hydrochloric ether. Same as chloric ether (which see, under chloric).

Hydrocheridae (hi-drō-ker' i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Hydrocherus + -idae.] A family of hystriomorphic rodents, represented by the genus Hydrocherus, related to the Caviidae, but distinguished by certain cranial and dental characters; the capibaras or water-cavies.

Hydrocherus (hi-drō-kē' rus), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑδωρ (hōp-), water, + χοίρειν, a pig.] The typical and only genus of Hydrocheridae, commonly referred to the Caviidae. There is but one species, H. capibara. See cut under capibara.

Hydrochoreutes (hi' drō-kō-rō' tēz), n. [NL. (Koch, 1837), < Gr. ὑδωρ (hōp-), water, + χορεύειν, a dancer, < χορεύω, dance, < χορός, a dance; see chorus.] A notable genus of water-mites, of the family Hydrachnidae. They are parasitic upon water-bugs, as H. globulus upon Nepa cinerea, and their larvae have been found adhering to the eyes of the larvae of Libellulidæ.

hydrochinonine (hi-drō-sing' kō-nin), n. [< hydro(gen) + cinchonine, q. v.] An artificial alkaloid (C₂₀H₂₃N₃O) derived from cinchonine, and differing from it in having two additional hydrogen atoms.

hydrocelia (hi-drō-sē' li-ā), n. [< Gr. ὑδωρ (hōp-), water, + κοιλία, a hollow, the belly.] In pathol., same as ascites.—Thomas, Med. Diet.

Hydrocorallinae (hi-drō-kor' a-li' nē), n. pl. [NL., < Hydra (q. v.) + LL. corallinus, coralline.] An order or suborder of Hydroidea, class Hydrozoa, resembling true corals, or coralligenous Actinozoa, but belonging to a different class; the coral-making hydroid hydrozoans, as milleporae or milleporine corals. They have a hard coral-like polypary and two kinds of zooids, the ordinary nutritive gastrozooids and the mouthless tentacular forms known as dactylozooids; the cenosarc consists of a network of anastomosing cells; reproduction is by means of gonophores. The Hydrocorallinae include two families, Milleporidae and Stylasteridae.

Hydrocoralline (hi-drō-kor' a-lin), a. and n. I. a. Pertaining to the Hydrocorallinae, or having their characters; milleporic.

II. n. One of the Hydrocorallinae; a milleporic or some similar coral.

Hydrocorax (hi-drōk' ō-raks), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑδωρ (hōp-), water, + κόραξ, a raven, crow.] 1. A genus of hornbills, of the family Bucerotidae, in which Brisson (1760) placed all the species of hornbills known to him: restricted by late writers to the group of hornbills of the Philippines of which Buceros hydrocorax of Linnaeus is the type, characterized by a flattened casque, chestnut-red and black plumage, and white tail.—2. A genus of cormorants, of the family Phalacrocoracidae: a synonym of Phalacrocorax or Graculus. Vieillot, 1816. See cut under cormorant.

Hydrocres (hi-drōk' ō-rēz), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. ὑδωρ (hōp-), water, + κρέσις, a bug.] Same as Hydrocorisæ.

Hydrocorisæ (hi-drōk' ō-rī-sē), n. pl. [NL. (Latreille), irreg. (< Gr. ὑδωρ (hōp-), water, + κρέσις, a bug.] A division of heteropterous Hemiptera, embracing the aquatic species. They are characterized by having short antennae concealed in cavities beneath the eyes, and subtoral legs. Called Cryptocera by Douglas and Scott, and by Hydrocorisæ by two divisions. Also Hydrocres, Hydrocoria.

hydrocotarnia (hi' drō-kō-tār' ni-ā), n. Same as hydrocotarnine.

hydrocotarnine (hi' drō-kō-tār' nin), n. [< hydro(gen) + cotarnine, q. v.] A crystalline alkaloid (C₁₂H₁₅NO₃) occurring in small amount in opium.

Hydrocotyle (hi-drō-kot' i-lē), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑδωρ (hōp-), water, + κοτύλη, a cavity, a cup.] The plants grow in moist situations and the leaves are hollowed like cups.] A genus of plants of the natural order Umbelliferae, type of the tribe Hydrocotyleae, having the fruit much compressed, the calyx-teeth minute or obsolete, the petals concave, valvate, or imbricate, and the umbels simple. About 70 species are known, very widely distributed over the warm and temperate parts of the world. They are usually small herbs, creeping and rooting at the nodes; a few are erect. H. vulgaris (common pennywort, pennyrot, or flukewort) is a common British plant, growing in boggy places and on the edges of lakes and rivulets. It has round peltate leaves, and small simple umbels of pale-pink flowers. There are a, flower; b, fruit; c, same cut transversely; d, tuber.

several American species, of which H. Americana and H. umbellata are the most abundant, the former being common in the Northern States, and the latter from Massachusetts south. H. Americana has recently been observed to produce tubers. (See cut.) H. umbellata has sometimes been called sheep's-bane, from its being supposed to cause foot-rot. H. Asiatica is employed in India as an alterative tonic, and the South African pennywort, H. contorta, is employed in dysentery.

Hydrocotyleae (hi' drō-kō-tīl' ē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (A. P. de Candolle, 1830), < Hydrocotyle + -ae.] A tribe of plants of the natural order Umbelliferae, in which the fruit is laterally much compressed or with the commissures often narrowly constricted, the carpels acute or obtuse on the back. Also written Hydrocotylidae (Lindley), Hydrocotylinae (Sprengel), and Hydrocotyleneae (Koch).

hydrocranium (hi-drō-kra' ni-um), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑδωρ (hōp-), water, + κρανίον, the skull, head.] Same as hydrocephalus, 1. Duglison.

hydrocuprite (hi-drō-kū' prīt), n. [< Gr. ὑδωρ (hōp-), water, + cuprite, q. v.] A supposed hydrated oxide of copper.

hydrocyanic (hi' drō-si-an' ik), a. [< hydro(gen) + cyan(ogen) + -ic.] In chem., pertaining to or derived from the combination of hydrogen and cyanogen.—Hydrocyanic acid, HCN, a colorless liquid which solidifies at 5° F. to feathery crystals, and boils at 80°. Its specific gravity is about 0.7. It dissolves freely in water, forming a liquid which reddens litmus-paper but slightly. Laurel-leaves, bitter almonds, and many stone-fruits contain amygdalin, which under the action of a ferment breaks up into grape-sugar, oil of bitter almonds, and hydrocyanic acid. It is generally prepared by the action of sulphuric acid on potassium ferrocyanide. It is one of the most prompt and virulent poisons known. Very dilute hydrocyanic acid is frequently used medicinally as a powerful sedative and anti-irritant, especially to allay cough. Its salts are called cyanides, and some of them are of great commercial importance, particularly potassium cyanide and the complex cyanides, potassium ferrocyanide and ferricyanide. Also prussic acid.

hydrocyanide (hi' drō-si' a-nid or -nid), n. [< hydrocyanic + -ide.] A salt of hydrocyanic acid: same as cyanide.

hydrocyanite (hi' drō-si' a-nit), n. [< Gr. ὑδωρ (hōp-), water, + κυανός, blue, + -ίτης; see cyanite.] Anhydrous sulphate of copper in pale-green crystals, found at Vesuvius as a sublimation product of the eruption of October, 1868. When exposed to the air the crystals absorb water and become bright-blue.

Hydrocyon (hi-drō-si' ō-n), n. [NL. (orig. Hydrocyon, Cuvier, 1817), < Gr. ὑδωρ (hōp-), water, + κύων, dog.] The typical genus of Hydrocyoninae. It includes African fresh-water fishes with elongated canine teeth, whence the name.

Hydrocyoninae (hi' drō-si' ō-ni' nē), n. pl. [NL., < Hydrocyon + -inae.] A subfamily of fishes of the family Characinae, typified by the genus Hydrocyon. They have large conical teeth in both jaws; an adipose fin; a short dorsal fin; rather narrow gill-openings, the gill-membranes being grown to the isthmus; and the nasal openings close together. Species occur in the fresh waters of both Africa and South America.

hydrocyst (hi' drō-sist), [< Gr. ὑδωρ (hōp-), water, + κύστις, a bladder (cyst).] One of the processes or tentacles attached to the cenosarc of the physophorous oceanic hydrozoans, borne with groups of gonophores upon a common stem, constituting a gonoblastidium or blastostyle. See cut under gonoblastidium.

hydrocystic (hi' drō-sis' tik), a. [< hydrocyst + -ic.] Having the character of a hydrocyst.

Hydrodictyae (hi' drō-dik-tī' ē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Kuetzing, 1843), < Hydrodictyon + -ae.] A subfamily of green-spored algae, typified by the genus Hydrodictyon. Also written Hydrodictyonaceae (Hassall), Hydrodictyonidae (Gray), and Hydrodicticeae (Mathew).

Hydrodictyon (hi' drō-dik-tī' on), n. [NL. (A. W. Roth, 1800), < Gr. ὑδωρ (hōp-), water, + δίκτυον, a net.] A genus of curious fresh-water algae, the type of the subfamily Hydrodictyae of the family Protococcaceae. The individual cells are oblong-cylindrical and united into a reticulated sac-like cœnobium; all are fertile; some produce macrogonidia, which join themselves into a cœnobium within the mother-cell; others produce microgonidia, which are furnished with vibratile cilia and a lateral red spot; these after a brief motile period subside into protococcoid, thick-walled spores. (Cooke.) The plant when full-grown resembles a long purse, whence the name water-net, and consists of a beautifully regular network of threads. The single known species, H. utriculatum, is common to North America and Europe.

The Hydrodictyon may be looked upon as an elaborate type of a cell-family, one in which cells are conjoined in accordance with a definite plan, so as to make a body of definite shape and size, yet in which each cell is independent being, drawing nothing from its neighbors.

H. C. Wood, Fresh-Water Algae, p. 93.

hydrodynamic (hi' drō-dī-nam' ik), a. [= F. hydrodynamique, < Gr. ὑδωρ (hōp-), water, + δύναμις, power; see dynamic.] Pertaining to or derived from the force or motion of a fluid; relating to hydrodynamics.

An important property of the harmonic nodal line, indicated by an interesting hydrodynamic theorem due to Rankine, is that, when self-cutting at any point or points, the different branches make equal angles with one another round each point of section.

Thomson and Tait, Nat. Phil., I. ii. ¶ 780.

hydrodynamical (hi' drō-dī-nam' i-ka), a. [< hydrodynamic + -al.] Same as hydrodynamic.

hydrodynamics (hi' drō-dī-nam' iks), n. [Pl. of hydrodynamic: see -ics.] The mathematical theory of the application of the principles of dynamics to fluids. As dynamics is used in two senses, the wider to include the theories both of rest and of motion, the narrower to include only the theory of motion, there are two corresponding senses of the word hydrodynamics. See dynamics. Also called hydrokinetics.—Equation of hydrodynamics. See equation.

hydrodynamometer (hi' drō-dī-nam' om' ē-tēr), n. [< Gr. ὑδωρ (hōp-), water, + Ε. dynamometer.]

An instrument for measuring the pressure exerted by a flowing liquid, and hence for determining its velocity.

Hydræcia¹ (hî-drê'si-ä), n. [NL. (Guenée, 1841), < Gr. ûdop (ûdôp-), water, + oikos, a house.] A genus of noctuid moths, of the family Apamiæ, having the male antennæ not pectinate, the proboscis moderately long, and the legs stout. There are many species, confined to Europe and North America. H. immanis is a hop-pest in the United States. H. micacea is known as the rosy-rustic.

hydræcia², n. Plural of hydræcium.

hydræcial (hî-drê'si-äl), a. [hydræcium + -äl.] Having the character of a hydræcium.

hydræcium (hî-drê'si-um), n.; pl. hydræcia (-ä). [NL., < Gr. ûdop (ûdôp-), water, + oikos, a house.] A sac attached to the swimming-bell or netocoxyl of certain oceanic hydrozoans, as calycophorans, into which the cœnosar may be retracted. See under Diphyidæ.

hydro-electric (hî-drô-ê-lek'trik), a. [Gr. ûdop (ûdôp-), water, + E. electric.] Effecting the development of electricity by a certain use of steam: as, a hydro-electric machine.—Hydro-electric machine, a machine for generating electricity by the escape of steam under high pressure from a series of jets connected with a strong boiler, in which the steam is produced. The jets of steam (which have to pass through a cooling-box) are electrified by friction. Positive electricity is collected by directing the steam upon a metal comb communicating with an insulated conductor.

hydroferricyanic (hî-drô-fer'î-si-an'ik), a. [hydro(gen) + ferricyanic, q. v.] Compounded of hydrogen and ferricyanogen.—Hydroferricyanic acid, $H_4Fe(CN)_2$, a strong hexavalent acid produced by the action of sulphuric acid and potassium ferricyanide. It forms brown deliquescent crystals.

hydroferrocyanic (hî-drô-fer'ô-si-an'ik), a. [hydro(gen) + ferrocyanic, q. v.] Compounded of hydrogen and ferrocyanogen.—Hydroferrocyanic acid, $H_4Fe(CN)_6$, a strong tetravalent acid formed by the action of dilute acid on potassium ferrocyanide.

hydrofluoboric (hî-drô-flû-ô-bô'rik), a. [hydro(gen) + fluoboric.] Same as fluoboric.

hydrofluoric (hî-drô-flû-ô-rik), a. [hydro(gen) + fluor(in) + -ic.] Consisting of fluorin and hydrogen. Also fluohydric, fluorhydric.—Hydrofluoric acid, HF, an acid obtained by distilling a mixture of fluor-spar with sulphuric acid. It has an intensely irritating, suffocating odor, and a very strong affinity for water, acts energetically on glass, and is most destructive to animal matter. Also called fluoric acid.

hydrofluosilicic (hî-drô-flû-ô-sil'î-kät), n. [hydrofluosilicic + -ate.] A salt formed by the union of hydrofluosilicic acid with a base.

hydrofluosilicic (hî-drô-flû-ô-sil'îs'ik), a. [hydro(gen) + fluosilicic.] Consisting of hydrofluoric and fluosilicic acid.—Hydrofluosilicic acid, a compound acid (H_2SiF_6) which is formed when silicon tetrafluoride is led into water. The saturated solution is a very acid, fuming, colorless liquid.

hydrofuge (hî-drô-fûj), a. [Gr. ûdop (ûdôp-), water, + L. fugare, put to flight, fugere, flee; see fugitive.] In zool., shedding water; impervious to water, as the plumage of ducks, the pubescence of many insects, etc.

hydrogalvanic (hî-drô-gal-van'ik), a. [Gr. ûdop (ûdôp-), water, + E. galvanic.] Pertaining to, consisting of, or produced by electricity evolved by the action or use of fluids: as, a hydrogalvanic current.

Hydrogastræ (hî-drô-gas'trê-ê), n. pl. [NL. (Endlicher and Unger, 1843), < Hydrogastrum + -æ.] A family of fresh-water algæ, allied closely to the *Vaucheria*æ. The plants are small, terrestrial, and unicellular, in the form of an expanded sack or bag at the top, with the lower portion excessively and finely branched, but with the cavity continuous. It contains the single genus Hydrogastrum. Also written Hydrogastridæ (Lindley).

Hydrogastrum (hî-drô-gas'trum), n. [NL. (Desvaux, 1810) (so called in allusion to the sack-like shape of the plants), < Gr. ûdop (ûdôp-), water, + γαστήρ, stomach.] A genus of fresh-water alga, the type of the family Hydrogastræ.

hydrogen (hî-drô-jen), n. [= F. hydrogène = Sp. hidrógeno = Pg. hidrogeno, hydrogenio = It. idrogeno, < NL. hydrogenium, hydrogen (so called because it is one of the elements of water, H_2O), < Gr. ûdop (ûdôp-), water, + γενής, producing; see -gen.] Chemical symbol, H. One of the elementary substances, existing as a colorless, tasteless, and odorless gas. It is the lightest substance known, and for that reason its specific gravity has been taken as the unit for comparing the specific gravity of gases, though air is the more commonly accepted standard. Under like conditions of temperature and pressure, hydrogen is approximately 14.4 times as light as an equal volume of air. Its combining weight is also less than that of any other element, and is therefore called unity, all the other atomic weights being expressed as multiples of it. It is slightly soluble in water or any other liquid. Hydrogen refracts light strongly, is extremely diffusible, and is absorbed or occluded in a remarkable manner by certain metals when they are heated, as though it formed a kind of alloy with them. Hydrogen burns in air with a very pale blue flame and intense heat, the sole product of combustion being water, H_2O , which is the protoxide of hydrogen. A mixture of two volumes of hydrogen and six of air or one of oxygen explodes violently when brought in contact with a flame or the electric spark. Hydrogen is not specifically poisonous when inhaled, but is fatal to life by preventing or hindering access of oxygen to the blood. It is prepared by the action of dilute sulphuric acid on zinc or iron, by passing steam through a red-hot tube filled with iron turnings, by the electrolysis of water, and in a variety of other ways. Hydrogen occurs free in nature in small quantity in the emanations of volcanoes and of some oil-wells, but generally it is found only in its combinations, which are universally distributed. One ninth of the weight of water consists of hydrogen, and it is an indispensable element of every animal and vegetable structure. It is a component of all acids, and its replacement in them by bases produces salts. In December, 1877, and January, 1878, the French chemists Cailliet and Picot succeeded in liquefying hydrogen, and the latter in solidifying it, by means of extreme pressure and cold produced in special forms of apparatus independently invented by them.—Arseniureted hydrogen. See arseniureted.—Bicarureted or heavy carureted hydrogen. Same as ethylene.—Hydrogen chloride, iodide, bromide, etc. Same as hydrochloric acid, hydroiodic acid, etc.—Hydrogen sulphid, or sulphureted hydrogen, H_2S , a colorless inflammable gas having a sweetish taste and an exceedingly fetid smell resembling rotten eggs. It is extremely poisonous when inhaled. It has feeble acid properties, and its compounds with bases are called sulphides. It occurs in the emanations of volcanoes, and is evolved when animal or vegetable tissue containing sulphur decays. It also occurs in mineral springs, being liberated by the reduction of gypsum or other sulphates through the action of a microbe.

Light, carureted hydrogen. See carureted.—Seleniureted hydrogen. Same as hydro-selenic acid (which see, under hydro-selenic).

hydrogenate (hî-drô-jen-ät), v. t.; pret. and pp. hydrogenated, ppr. hydrogenating. [hydro(gen) + -ate.] To cause to combine with hydrogen; hydrogenize.

hydrogenation (hî-drô-jen-ä'shon), n. [hydro(gen) + -ion.] The act of hydrogenating, or the state of being hydrogenated.

This hydrogenation is easily effected by treating cuprous acetylene with hydrogen.

W. R. Bowditch, Coal Gas, p. 284.

hydrogeniferous (hî-drô-jen-if'e-rus), a. [hydro(gen) + L. ferre = E. bear.] Containing hydrogen.

hydrogenise, v. t. See hydrogenize.

hydrogenium (hî-drô-jê-ni-um), n. [NL.: see hydro(gen).] 1. Hydrogen regarded as a metal; solidified hydrogen.

Water is the rust of hydrogenium, a true metal.

J. R. Nichols, Fire-side Science, p. 182.

2. Hydrogen occluded by palladium. See occlusion. Graham.

hydrogenize (hî-drô-jen-iz), v. t.; pret. and pp. hydrogenized, ppr. hydrogenizing. [hydro(gen) + -ize.] To combine with hydrogen; form a hydrogenous compound of. Also spelled hydrogenise.

Chlorine readily enters into reaction with a large number of hydrogenated carbon compounds, and displaces the hydrogen more or less completely. Encyc. Bril., V. 493.

hydrogenous (hî-drô-jê-nus), a. [hydro(gen) + -ous.] 1. Pertaining to or containing hydrogen.—2. Formed or produced by water: applied to rocks formed by the action of water, in contradistinction to pyrogenous rocks, or those formed by the action of fire.

hydrogeology (hî-drô-jê-ôl'ô-jî), n. [Gr. ûdop (ûdôp-), water, + E. geology.] The geology of water; that part of geological science which has to do with the relations of water standing or flowing beneath the surface of the earth. The term is but little used, and rarely, if ever, with reference to chemical changes brought about at depth by the agency of water, or in which water plays a part.

hydrogiobertite (hî-drô-jô-bêrt'it), n. [Gr. ûdop (ûdôp-), water, + giobertite, q. v.] A hydrous carbonate of magnesium occurring in small spherical forms of a light-gray color at Vesuvius.

hydrognosy (hî-drog-nô-si), n. [= Sp. hidrognosia, < Gr. ûdop (ûdôp-), water, + γνῶσις, knowledge.] A treatise on, or a history and description of, the waters of the earth.

hydrographer (hî-drog'ra-fer), n. [As hydrograph-y + -er.] One who is versed in the science or engaged in the practice of hydrography; specifically, one who has charge of hydrographic surveys and of other operations belonging to hydrography.

In all coasts, what moon maketh full sea, and what way the tides and ebbs come and go, the hydrographer ought to record. Dee, Pref. to Euclid (1570).

He [Dr. Halley] likewise corrected the position of the coast of Brazil, which had been very erroneously laid down by all former hydrographers. Anson, Voyage, I. 8.

hydrographic (hî-drô-graf'ik), a. [As hydrograph-y + -ic.] Of, pertaining to, or treating of hydrography: as, a hydrographic survey or treatise.—Hydrographic Office, an office of the Navy Department of the United States, connected with the Bureau of Navigation. Its duties are to provide nautical charts, sailing directions, etc., for United States vessels and others. Its head is called the hydrographer. Other governments have similar bureaus.

hydrographical (hî-drô-graf'î-kal), a. [hydrographic + -al.] Same as hydrographic.

The artificer must in the framing of his little engine have had due regard to all these, and consequently have had a comprehension of divers celestial and hydrographical truths. Boyle, Works, VI. 724.

hydrography (hî-drog'ra-fi), n. [= F. hydrographie = Sp. hidrografia = Pg. hidrografia = It. idrografia, < Gr. ûdop (ûdôp-), water, + γραφία, < γράφειν, write.] 1. The science of the measurement and description of the sea, lakes, rivers, and other waters, with especial reference to their use for the purposes of navigation and commerce. It embraces pilotage and marine surveying, the determination of winds, currents, etc., as well as the art of forming charts exhibiting not only the sea-coast, gulfs, bays, islands, promontories, channels, and their configuration and geographical position, but also the contour of the bottom of the sea and of harbors. It also embraces the study of the relation of changes in depth to their causes.

Hydrography requireth a particular register of certain landmarks (where marks may be had) from the sea well able to be skried, in what points of the sea-compass they appear, and what apparent form, situation, or bigness they have in respect of any dangerous place in the sea or near unto it assigned. Dee, Pref. to Euclid (1570).

Setting downe always with great care and diligence true observations & notes of all those countreys, islands, coasts of the sea, and other things requisite to the artes of navigation and hydrographie.

Hakluyt's Voyages, I. 417.

2. The distribution, character, and relations of bodies of water; the condition of the earth or any part of it with respect to its seas, rivers, etc.: as, the hydrography of North America.

hydroguret (hî-drog'û-ret), n. [hydro(gen) + -uret.] A compound of hydrogen with a base.

hydrogureted, hydroguretted (hî-drog'û-ret-ed), a. [hydroguret + -ed.] Combined with hydrogen, as a metal or other base.

hydrohematite, hydrohæmatite (hî-drô-hem-ä-tit), n. [Gr. ûdop (ûdôp-), water, + E. hematite.] A hydrated iron sesquioxide, resembling the anhydrous iron sesquioxide hematite, particularly in its red streak. See turgite.

hydrohemostat, hydrohæmostat (hî-drô-hem-ô-stat), n. [Gr. ûdop (ûdôp-), water, + αἷμα, blood, + στατός, verbal adj. of σταίω, cause to stand; see static. Cf. hemostatic.] A device to arrest a hemorrhage, consisting of a bag through which cold water is passed, while it is pressed against the surface.

hydroid (hî-drô'id), a. and n. [Gr. ὑδροειδής, like water, < ûdop (ûdôp-), water, + εἶδος, form. In defs. 2 and 3, as Hydra + -oid.] 1. a. 1. Like water; living in the water.—2. Resembling the hydra, or an animal of the genus Hydra.—3. Pertaining to the Hydroidea or Hydrozoa, or having their characters: as, a hydroid hydrozoan.—Hydroid stock, a stolon; a hydorrhiza.

II. n. One of the Hydroidea.

In the Gulf of Mexico are communities of hydroids so organized that they seem to constitute but one animal.

Pop. Sci. Mo., XIII. 318.

Calyptoblastic hydroids. See calyptoblastic.—Tubularian hydroids. See Gymnoblastæa.

Hydroidea (hî-drô'id-ê-ä), n. pl. [NL.: see hydroid.] An order or subclass of the class Hydrozoa, approximately equivalent to Hydrophora, and consisting of the eleuthero-blastic, gymnoblastic, and calyptoblastic hydrozoans.

aromica + aceous.] Of the nature of hydromica; containing hydromica.

Hydromicaceous and argillaceous schists.

Amer. Jour. Sci., 3d ser., XXX, 282.

hydromotor (hî-drô-mô'tor), n. [< Gr. ὑδρὸς (hî-drô), water, + NL. motor, motor.] A form of motor, designed for the propulsion of vessels, in which the propelling power is that of jets of water ejected from the sides or stern.

The little vessel supplied with the hydromotor met with a fair degree of success. Sci. Amer., N. S., LV, 47.

hydromphalum (hî-drô-m'fā-lum), n. [< Gr. ὑδρόμαλος, having water in the umbilical regions, < ὑδρὸς (hî-drô), water, + μαλός, boss, knob, navel.] In pathol., an accumulation of serous liquid in the sac of an umbilical hernia, or simply the extension of the umbilicus by ascites. Also hydromphalon.

hydromys (hî-drô-mid), n. An animal of the genus Hydromys. E. Blyth.

hydromyelia (hî-drô-mi-ē'lî-ā), n. [< Gr. ὑδρὸς (hî-drô), water, + μυελός, marrow.] In pathol., the distention of the central canal or ventricular cavity of the spinal cord with a serous liquid. See hydrorachis. Also hydromyelus.

Hydromyinae (hî-drô-mi-i'nē), n. pl. [< Hydromys + -inae.] A subfamily of rodents of the family Muridae, of which the type is the genus Hydromys, and in which the teeth are only 12 in number.

Hydromys (hî-drô-mis), n. [< Gr. ὑδρὸς (hî-drô), water, + μῦς = E. mouse.] A genus of rodents constituting the subfamily Hydromyinae, confined to the Australian region, where the species are known as water-rats and beaver-rats. H. chrysogaster is an example. Geoffroy, 1805. See cut under beaver-rat.

hydromysta, hydromystes (hî-drô-mis'tā, -tēs), n. [< LGr. ὑδρόμυστης, < Gr. ὑδρὸς (hî-drô), water, + μύστης, one who initiates: see mystagogue.] In the early church, a presbyter or cleric who sprinkled with holy water the people entering or leaving a church.

hydronaphthol (hî-drô-naf'thol), n. [< Gr. ὑδρὸς (hî-drô), water, + E. naphthol.] An antiseptic preparation, probably one of the naphthols, prepared from naphthalene. [Trade-name.]

Hydrometeae (hî-drô-nē-mā'tē-ē), n. pl. [< NL. (Nees von Esenbeck, 1823), < Gr. ὑδρὸς (hî-drô), water, + μέτρον (-r-), a thread, + -ae.] In bot., same as Algae.

hydronephelite (hî-drô-nēf'ē-lit), n. [< Gr. ὑδρὸς (hî-drô), water, + nephelīte, q. v.] A hydrous silicate of aluminum and sodium, related to thomsonite in composition, and derived from the alteration of elaeolite (nephelite).

hydronephrosis (hî-drô-nēf-rō'sis), n. [< Gr. ὑδρὸς (hî-drô), water, + νεφρός, kidney, + -osis.] In pathol., a condition produced by obstruction of the outflow of the urine through the ureter, so that the ureter and the renal pelvis become greatly distended.

hydronephrotic (hî-drô-nēf-rō'tik), a. Pertaining to or affected with hydronephrosis.

hydronette (hî-drô-net), n. [< F. hydronette, < Gr. ὑδρὸς (hî-drô), water, + -nette, a mere insertion, + -ette.] 1. A syringe.—2. A portable force-pump for use in gardens and conservatories.

Hydromastatae (hî-drô-pa-ras'tā-tē), n. pl. [< LGr. ὑδρομαστάται, < Gr. ὑδρὸς (hî-drô), water, + πασάσται, one who stands by, an assistant: see parastatic.] A sect which separated from the early church in the latter part of the second century: so named from their use of water only, instead of wine and water, in the eucharist. Also called Aquarians and Encratites.

hydropath (hî-drô-path), n. [< hydropath-y.] Same as hydropathist.

hydropathic, hydropathical (hî-drô-path'ik, -ikal), a. [< hydropathy + -ic-al.] Relating to hydropathy.

hydropathist (hî-drô-pā-thist), n. [< hydropathy + -ist.] 1. One who is versed in or practices hydropathy.—2. One who believes in the efficacy of hydropathic treatment.

He has tried both hydropathy and homeopathy; . . . has now settled into a confirmed hydropathist.

G. A. Sala, Dutch Pictures.

hydropathy (hî-drô-pā-thi), n. [= F. hydropathie; a name formed after the supposed analogy of homeopathy, allopathy, etc., and intended to signify 'water-cure' or 'water-treatment'; < Gr. ὑδρὸς (hî-drô), water, + πάθος, suffering, disease.] The method of treating diseases by the external and internal use of water; hydrotherapeutics, especially in the cruder forms. See water-cure.

hydropericardium (hî-drô-per-i-kār'di-um), n. [< NL., < Gr. ὑδρὸς (hî-drô), water, + περικάρδιον, pericardium.] In pathol., the accumulation of serous liquid in the pericardial cavity. Also called hydrocardia.

hydroperitoneum (hî-drô-per'î-tō-nē-um), n. [< Gr. ὑδρὸς (hî-drô), water, + περὶτοναίον, peritoneum.] In pathol., the effusion of lymph into the peritoneal cavity; ascites.

hydrophane (hî-drô-fān), n. [< Gr. ὑδρὸς (hî-drô), water, + φανός, clear, < φαίνω, show, shine.] A partly translucent whitish or light-colored variety of opal, which absorbs water upon immersion and then becomes transparent. Also called oculus mundi.

hydrophanous (hî-drô-fā-nus), a. [As hydrophane + -ous.] Made transparent by immersion in water. See hydrophane.

Hydrophasianus (hî-drô-fā-si-ā-nus), n. [< NL., < Gr. ὑδρὸς (hî-drô), water, + φασιανός, a pheasant.] A genus of jacanas, of the family Par-

Asiatic Water-pheasant (Hydrophasianus chirurgus).

ridae or Jacaniidae, established by Wagler in 1832, containing the Asiatic water-pheasant or pheasant-tailed jacana, H. chirurgus. See Jacana.

hydrophid (hî-drô-fid), n. A venomous sea-snake of the family Hydrophidae.

Hydrophidæ (hî-drôf'id-ē), n. pl. [< Hydrophid + -idæ.] A family of ophiidians of the suborder Proteroglypha, with permanently erect poison-fangs, and the tail compressed and fin-like, and thus fitted for swimming; the sea-snakes, or marine venomous serpents. These snakes inhabit the Indian ocean and tropical parts of the Pacific, and are extremely poisonous. There are several genera, as Hydrophis, Platyrus, and Pelamis.

hydrophil (hî-drô-fil), n. [< NL. Hydrophilus.] A water-beetle of the genus Hydrophilus, or one of the Hydrophilidae.

hydrophilid (hî-drô-fil'id), n. One of the Hydrophilidae.

Hydrophilidæ (hî-drô-fil'id-ē), n. pl. [< NL., < Hydrophilus + -idæ.] A family of elavicorn beetles, with numerous genera and species. The dorsal segments are partly membranous; the ventral segments are free; at least one pair of tarsi are 5-jointed; the palpi are distant at base; and the angles of the large quadrate mentum are not prolonged. The same or a corresponding group of water-loving beetles is called Hydrophilidae, Hydrophilus, Hydrophilus, Hydrophilites, or Hydrophilitoidea. See also cut under Hydrobius.

hydrophilite (hî-drôf'id-lit), n. [< Gr. ὑδρὸς (hî-drô), water, + φίλος, loving, + -ite.] Native calcium chlorid. Also called chlorocalcite.

hydrophilous (hî-drôf'id-lus), a. [< Gr. ὑδρὸς (hî-drô), water, + φίλος, loving.] In bot., pollinated by the agency of water. Compare anemophilous, entomophilous.

Hydrophilus (hî-drôf'id-lus), n. [< NL., < Gr. ὑδρὸς (hî-drô), water, + φίλος, loving.] The typical genus of Hydrophilidae. It contains the largest beetles of the family, such as the giant water-beetle, E. trisignatus, a common North American species, of a shining black color, 1½ inches long. The corresponding European species is H. piceus. Also called Hydrosona.

Hydrophis (hî-drô-fis), n. [< Gr. ὑδρὸς (hî-drô), water, + φῆς, a snake.] The typical genus of Hydrophidae or sea-snakes. One of the commonest sea-snakes is the chital, H. cyanicincta, which attains a length of 5 or 6 feet, and is of a greenish color becoming yellowish below, with numerous transverse black blotches.

hydrophite (hî-drô-fit), n. [< Gr. ὑδρὸς (hî-drô), water, + φῆς, snake, + -ite.] A massive mineral of a green color.

It is a hydrous silicate of iron and magnesium, allied to deweylite and to serpentine.

hydrophobe (hî-drô-fōb), n. [= F. hydrophobe = Sp. hidrófobo = Pg. hydrophobo = It. idrofobo, < L. hydrophobus, < Gr. ὑδρόφοβος, having a horror of water: see hydrophobia.] One who is suffering from hydrophobia.

hydrophobia (hî-drô-fō-bî-ā), n. [Also hydrophoby, formerly hydrophobie, < F. hydrophobie = Sp. hidrófobia = Pg. hydrophobia = It. idrofobia; < LL. hydrophobia, < Gr. ὑδρόφοβια, a horror of water caused by the bite of a mad dog, < ὑδρόφοβος, having a horror of water, < ὑδρὸς (hî-drô), water, + φόβος, fear, φόβος, fear.] In pathol.: (a) A symptom of rabies in man, consisting in a furious aversion to liquids and an inability to swallow them. See rabies. Hence — (b) Rabies, especially in human beings.

Athenodorus . . . writeth that not only the . . . leprosie, but also the hydrophobie—that is to say, the fear of water occasioned by the biting of a mad dog—were first discovered in the days of Asclepiades.

Holland, tr. of Plutarch, p. 638.

(c) Any morbid or unnatural dread of water, such as may exist independently of rabies.

hydrophobic (hî-drô-fō-bik), a. [< LL. hydrophobicus, < Gr. ὑδρόφοβικός, < ὑδρόφοβια, hydrophobia: see hydrophobia.] Of, pertaining to, or affected with hydrophobia or rabies; rabid.

There are people who deny the existence of hydrophobic infection. The American, VI, 271.

hydrophobophobia (hî-drô-fō-bō-fō-bî-ā), n. [< NL., < Gr. ὑδρόφοβια, hydrophobia, + φόβος, fear, as in hydrophobia, q. v.] In pathol., a morbid condition produced by excessive dread of rabies, which may simulate its real or supposed symptoms.

hydrophoby (hî-drô-fō-bi), n. [See hydrophobia.] Hydrophobia. [Rare.]

They set up the long howl of hydrophoby at my principles. Coleridge, To Sir George Beaumont.

Hydrophora (hî-drô-fō-rā), n. pl. [< NL., < Gr. ὑδρόφορος, carrying water: see hydrophore.] One of the three divisions into which Huxley and other authors divide the Hydrozoa, the other two being the Discophora and the Siphonophora. The members are, in all cases except that of Hydra, fixed ramified hydrosomes, on which many hydranths and gonophores are developed. The tentacles are either scattered over the hydranths or arranged in one circle round the mouth, or in two circles, one close to the mouth and one near the aboral end. Very generally—for example, in all Sertulariidae and Tubulariidae—there is a hard chitinous cuticular skeleton or conosome, which usually gives rise to hydrothecae, into which the hydranths can be retracted. The gonophores present every variety, from sacs to free-swimming medusoids. The inner margin of the bell in these medusoids is always produced into a velum, and otolith-like sacs and eye-spots are very generally disposed at regular intervals round the circumference of the bell. The great majority of what are sometimes termed the naked-eyed medusae, Gymnophthalmata, are simply the free-swimming gonophores of Hydrophora.

hydrophoran (hî-drôf'ō-ran), a. and n. 1. a. Having the characters of the Hydrophora; pertaining to the Hydrophora. 2. n. One of the Hydrophora.

hydrophore (hî-drô-fōr), n. [< Gr. ὑδρόφορος, carrying water, < ὑδρὸς (hî-drô), water, + φόρος, < φέρω = E. bear.] An instrument for obtaining specimens of water from any desired depth below the surface.

hydrophorous (hî-drôf'ō-rus), a. Pertaining to the Hydrophora.

hydrophthalmia (hî-drôf-thal'mi-ā), n. [< NL., < Gr. ὑδρὸς (hî-drô), water, + ὀφθαλμός, eye.] In pathol., an increase in the quantity of either the aqueous or the vitreous humor. Dunghison.—Hydrophthalmia anterior. Same as buphthalmos.

hydrophthalmus (hî-drôf-thal'mi), n. Same as hydrophthalmia. [Rare.]

Hydrophyceae (hî-drô-fî-sē-ē), n. pl. [< NL. (Fries, 1825), < Gr. ὑδρὸς (hî-drô), water, + φῆς, a seaweed (see fucus), + -ae.] In bot., same as Algae.

Hydrophyllaceae (hî-drô-fî-lā-sē-ē), n. pl. [< NL. (Lindley, 1836), < Hydrophyllum + -aceae.]

Hydrophis cyanicincta.

A natural order of plants, the waterleaf family, consisting mostly of herbs, or rarely shrubs, with a watery insipid juice, alternate or rarely opposite leaves, no stipules, mostly scorpoid inflorescence, regular pentamerous and pentandrous flowers, with the stamens borne on the lower part of the corolla and alternate with its lobes, a dimerous ovary, and 2 distinct styles. There are 16 genera and about 150 species, most of which are North American. Also called Hydroleaceæ.

Hydrophyllæ (hî-drô-fîl'ê-ê), n. pl. [NL., < Hydrophyllum + -æ.] A tribe of plants of the natural order Hydrophyllaceæ, differing from the other tribes in having the corolla-lobes often contorted.

hydrophyllia, n. Plural of hydrophyllium.
hydrophyllaceous (hî-drô-fîl-i-â'shi-us), a. [Hydrophyllum + -aceous.] Having the characters of a hydrophyllum.

hydrophyllum (hî-drô-fîl'um), n.; pl. hydrophyllia (-i-â). [NL., < Gr. ὕδωρ (ûp-), water, + φύλλον = L. folium, leaf.] The peculiar protective envelop or hydrotheca of the hydranths of some oceanic hydrozoans, as the Siphonophora, of laminar or foliaceous character. Also called bract.

Detached Hydrophyllia of Aethyria rosacea, a siphonophore hydrozoan.

hydrophylls (hî-drô-fîlz), n. pl. [(Lindley, 1846) < Hydrophyllum.] Lindley's name for the waterleaf family, the Hydrophyllaceæ.

Hydrophyllum (hî-drô-fîl'um), n. [NL. (Tournefort) (so called because of a cavity in each leaf which holds a small quantity of water), < Gr. ὕδωρ (ûp-), water, + φύλλον, a leaf.] A genus of dicotyledonous gamopetalous plants, the type of the natural order Hydrophyllaceæ and tribe Hydrophyllæ. They are characterized by having the calyx nearly open, with or without a small appendage at each sinus; the corolla campanulate, the tube within bearing a linear longitudinal appendage opposite to each lobe, with in-folded edges forming a nectariferous groove; filaments and style long-exserted; ample petioled leaves; and the flowers white or pale-blue, and cymose. Only 6 or 8 species are known, all natives of North America. They are all called waterleaf.
hydrophysocèle (hî-drô-fî'sô-sêl), n. [Gr. ὕδωρ (ûp-), water, + φύσα, a bellows, a bubble, + κύημα, a tumor.] In pathol., a hernia containing both serous fluids and gas.

Waterleaf (Hydrophyllum Virginicum). a, flower; b, fruit.

Hydrophyta (hî-drô-fî-tâ), n. pl. [NL. (Lyngbye, 1819), < Gr. ὕδωρ (ûp-), water, + φύτον, a plant.] 1. A name proposed as a substitute for the word Algae. The word has never been much used, and is, moreover, objectionable, since not all submerged plants are algae, and it is not applicable to aerial forms. 2. [l. c.] Plural of hydrophyton.

hydrophyte (hî-drô-fî-t), n. [Gr. ὕδωρ (ûp-), water, + φύτον, a plant.] A plant which grows in water; an aquatic plant.

hydrophytography (hî-drô-fî-tog'ra-fi), n. [As hydrophyte + Gr. -γραφία, < γράφειν, write.] The description of water-plants. [Rare.]

hydrophytology (hî-drô-fî-tol'ô-jî), n. [As hydrophyte + Gr. -λογία, < λέγειν, speak; see -ology.] That branch of botany which relates to aquatic plants.

hydrophyton (hî-drô-fî-ton), n.; pl. hydrophyta (-tâ). [NL., < Gr. ὕδωρ (ûp-), water, + φύτον, a plant.] In the hydroid aculephs, the common support by which the several zooids of a colony are connected one with another. The base or proximal end of the hydrophyton is the hydrorhiza; the intermediate part between the hydrorhiza and the hydranth is the hydrorachis.

hydrotytus (hî-drô-fî-tus), a. [As hydrophyton + -ous.] Having the character of a hydro-hydropic (hî-drop'ik), a. and n. [ME. ydropik, < OF. hydropique, idropique, F. hydropique = Sp. hidropico = Pg. hydropico = It. idropico, < L. hydropicus, < Gr. ὕδρωτικός, dropsical, < ὕδωρ, dropsy; see hydropsy, dropsy.] 1. a. Containing or produced by water; dropsical.

Drye folk & hydropike, & dede at the laste;
Alle called on that cortayse & claymed his grace.
Alliterative Poems (ed. Morris), ii. 1006.

Hydropick humors not discernable at first from a fair and juicy fleshiness of body.

Milton, On Def. of Humb. Remonst.
Every lust is a kind of hydropick distemper, and the more we drink the more we shall thirst.
Tillotson.

II. n. 1. A medicine that relieves or cures dropsy.—2. A dropsical person.

hydropical (hî-drop'ik-al), a. [Gr. ὑδρωπικός + -al.] Same as hydropic.

Waterish or hydropical tumours are the effects of an extravasated serum.
Wiseman, Surgery, i. 23.

hydropically (hî-drop'ik-al-i), adv. In a hydropical or dropsical manner.

It may I confess by siccidity and astringency afford a confirmation unto parts relaxed, and such as be hydropically disposed.
Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., ii. 3.

hydropisyt, n. An earlier form of hydropsy.

hydropianula (hî-drô-plan'î-lâ), n.; pl. hydropianulæ (-lê). [NL., < Hydra, a genus of hydrozoans, + planula, a stage of the embryo.] The transitional stage of the embryo of a hydrozoan intermediate between the planula and the tentaculated actinula.

hydropneumatic (hî-drô-nû-mat'ik), a. [Gr. ὕδωρ (ûp-), water, + πνευματικός, of or caused by wind or air; see pneumatic.] Of or pertaining to, or produced by, the action of water and air; involving the combined action of water and air or gas.—Hydropneumatic accumulator. See accumulator.

hydropneumonia (hî-drô-nû-mô-nî-â), n. [NL., < Gr. ὕδωρ (ûp-), water, + NL. pneumonia, q. v.] In pathol., dropsy or edema of the lungs.

hydropneumopericardium (hî-drô-nû-mô-peri-kâr-di-um), n. [NL., < Gr. ὕδωρ (ûp-), water, + πνεῦμα, breath, wind (cf. πνεῦμα, lung), + περικάρδιον, pericardium.] In pathol., the presence of serous fluid and air in the pericardial cavity.

hydropneumothorax (hî-drô-nû-mô-thô-raks), n. [NL., < Gr. ὕδωρ (ûp-), water, + NL. pneumothorax, q. v.] In pathol., the presence of air and serous fluid in a pleural cavity.

hydropolyp (hî-drô-pol-ip), n. [Gr. ὕδωρ (ûp-), water, + πολύπους, polyp; see polyp.] A hydroid polyp; a hydrozoan, as distinguished from a coral polyp or actinozoan.

Hydropolypinae (hî-drô-pol-i-pî-nê), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. ὕδωρ (ûp-), water, + πολύπους, polyp, + -inae.] A suborder of Hydromedusæ, multiplying by budding and by sexual products which do not appear in the shape of medusæ. The budding polyps may be disintegrated from the parent and so all remain solitary, or they may remain attached and so form a colony. In both cases sexual multiplication alternates with the process of budding. The sexual products are matured in the wall of the body-cavity, which may form hollow tentacular processes in which the ova and spermatozoa are found.

hydropropulsion (hî-drô-prô-pul'shon), n. [Gr. ὕδωρ (ûp-), water, + Ε. propulsion.] Propulsion of vessels by a hydromotor.

hydrops (hî-drops), n. [NL., < Gr. ὕδρωσις, dropsy, < ὕδωρ (ûp-), water; see hydro. Cf. hydropsy.] Same as hydropsy.—Hydrops of the anterior chamber. Same as buphthalmos.

hydropsy (hî-drop-sî), n. [Earlier hydropisy, < F. hydropisie = Sp. hidropesia = Pg. hidropesia, hydropisia = It. idropisia, < L. hydropisis, for hydropiasis*, < Gr. ὕδρωσις, dropsy, < ὕδωρ, water, have the dropsy, < ὕδωρ, dropsy; see hydrops.] Dropsy: the original form, of which dropsy is a contraction.

Soft-swollen and pale, here lay the Hydropsy:
Unwieldy man; with belly monstrous round.
Thomson, Castle of Indolence, i. 75.

Hydropsyche (hî-drop-sî-kê), n. [NL., < Gr. ὕδωρ (ûp-), water, + ψυχή, a butterfly; see Psyche.] The typical genus of Hydropsychidae.

Hydropsychidæ (hî-drop-sî-kî-dê), n. pl. [NL. (Curtis, 1835), < Hydropsyche + -idæ.] A family of trichopterous insects, or caddis-flies, typified by the genus Hydropsyche, having the third joint of the maxillary palpi elongate and filiform, the antennæ setaceous, and the feet spurred. The larvae are aquatic and predaceous, and inhabit stationary cases.

Hydropteridæ (hî-drop-tê-rid'ê-â), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. ὕδωρ (ûp-), water, + πτερίς or πτερίς (-id-), a fern, + -æ.] A class or group of cryptogamous plants, the heterosporous Filicinae, comprising the families Marsiliaceæ and Salviniaaceæ, which are characterized by possessing both macrospores and microspores. Also called Rhizocarpeæ.

hydropytic (hî-drop'tik), a. [Irreg. < hydropsy + -ic.] Pertaining to or affected with dropsy; dropsical; hence, thirsty. [Rare.]

This I made account that I begun early, when I understood the study of our laws; but was diverted by the worst voluptuousness, which is an hydropytic immoderate desire of human learning and languages.
Donne, Letters, xx.

He, soul-hydropytic with a sacred thirst,
Sucked at the flagon.
Browning, Grammarian's Funeral.

Hydroptila (hî-drop'tî-lâ), n. [NL. (Dalman, 1819), < Gr. ὕδωρ (ûp-), water, + πτίλον, down, feathers.] The typical genus of caddis-flies of the family Hydroptilidæ, having ocelli, scarcely acuminate wings, and the head with elevated lobes posteriorly.

Hydroptilidæ (hî-drop-tîl'î-dê), n. pl. [NL. (Stephens, 1836), < Hydroptila + -idæ.] A family of trichopterous insects, or caddis-flies, typified by the genus Hydroptila, containing very minute forms which resemble microlepidopterous insects. They are very hairy, with simple palpi and short antennæ. The larvae are found in both running and standing water, and build free membranous cases, to which a few grains of sand are sometimes added.

hydropult (hî-drô-pult), n. [Gr. ὕδωρ (ûp-), water, + Ε. (cata)pult.] A portable force-pump; a garden-pump. Also hydropult.

hydropyretic (hî-drô-pî-ret'ik), a. [Gr. ὕδωρ (ûp-), water, + πυρετός, fever; see pyretic.] In pathol., of or pertaining to fever that is accompanied by sweating.

hydroquinone (hî-drô-kwî-nôn), n. [Gr. ὑδρο- (gen) + quinone.] A divalent phenol (C₆H₄(OH)₂) prepared by the oxidation of aniline and treatment of the quinol formed with sulphurous acid. It is a crystalline substance with a sweet taste, and is readily soluble in hot water. It is much used in place of pyrogallol as an agent for the development of photographic plates. Also hydrochinon and erichinone, and more properly hydroquinol.

Hydroquinone belongs to a class of organic bodies that the chemist calls diphenols. Sci. Amer., N. S., LVII. 376.

hydrorachis, hydrorrhachis (hî-dror'a-kis), n. [NL., < Gr. ὕδωρ (ûp-), water, + ράχis, spine.] In pathol., serous effusion in the spinal canal. When this is in cavities within the spinal cord it is called hydrorachis interna, or hydromyelia; when between the cord and the walls of the canal, hydrorachis externa. Hydrorachis alone usually denotes hydrorachis externa.

hydrorhiza (hî-drô-rî-zâ), n.; pl. hydrorhizæ (-zê). [NL., < Gr. ὕδωρ (ûp-), water, + ρίζα, root.] The corm or rootstock of a fixed hydrozoan; the common base of a colony of hydroids, by which it is attached to some support.

The base begins to divide up and send out processes. These latter grow and ramify in a manner strikingly like that of the roots of a tree, and produce what is technically known as the hydrorhiza.
Stand. Nat. Hist., I. 78.

hydrorhizal (hî-drô-rî-zal), a. [Gr. hydrorhiza + -al.] Having the character of a hydrorhiza; pertaining to a hydrorhiza.

hydrorhodonite (hî-drô-rô-dô-nit), n. [Gr. ὕδωρ (ûp-), water, + ρόδος, rose, + -ίτης.] A hydrated manganese silicate found at Långban in Sweden.

hydrorrhea, hydrorrhæa (hî-drô-rê-â), n. [NL. hydrorrhæa, < Gr. ὕδωρ, lit. a flowing of water, < ὕδωρ (ûp-), water, + ῥέω, a flowing, < πέω, flow.] In pathol., a copious watery discharge.

hydrosalpinx (hî-drô-sal'pingsks), n. [Gr. ὕδωρ (ûp-), water, + σάλπιγξ, a trumpet.] In pathol., the accumulation of serous liquid in a Fallopian tube.

hydrosarcocele (hî-drô-sâr-kô-sêl), n. [Gr. ὕδωρ (ûp-), water, + sarcocele, q. v.] In pathol., sarcocele attended with dropsy of the tunica vaginalis.

Hydrosaurus (hî-drô-sâ-rus), n. [NL., < Gr. ὕδωρ (ûp-), water, + σαῦρος, lizard.] A notable genus of monitor-lizards, of the family Monitoridae or Varanidae: so named from their aquatic habits. H. salvator, the water-monitor, is said to attain a length of 8 feet; it inhabits India and the Malay peninsula, and is known there as the kabara-goya. An Australian species, H. giganteus, is known as the lace-lizard.

Water-monitor (Hydrosaurus satorator).

hydroscope (hi-drō-skōp), n. [= F. hydroscop = Pg. hydroscop = It. idroscop, < Gr. ὑδροσκόπος, a water-clock (cf. ὑποσκόπος, seeking or finding water), < ὑδωρ (hōp), water, + σκοπεῖν, view.] 1. A kind of water-clock or instrument formerly used for measuring time, consisting of a cylindrical graduated tube, from which water slowly escaped through an aperture in the conical bottom, the subsidence of the water marking the lapse of time.—2. A hydroscope.

hydroselenate (hi-drō-sel'e-nāt), n. [hydro-selen-ic + -ate.] In chem., a salt formed by the union of hydroselenic acid with a salifiable base. Also called selenide.

hydroselenic (hi-drō-sē-len'ik), a. [hydro-(gen) + selen(um) + -ic.] Of or pertaining to a combination of hydrogen and selenium.—Hydroselenic acid, H₂Se, a colorless gas which resembles sulphuretted hydrogen, but is much more offensive. Also called seleniuretted hydrogen.

hydrosoma (hi-drō-sō-mā), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑδωρ (hōp), water, + σῶμα, body.] 1. Pl. hydrosomata (-mā-tā). The entire body of a hydrozoan, usually compounded of several hydranths. Also hydrosome.

In an early stage . . . every hydrozoön is represented by a single hydranth, . . . but, in many cases, the buds developed from the primary hydranth remain connected together by a common stem or cenosarc, and thus give rise to a compound body, or hydrosoma.

Huxley, Anat. Invert., p. 117.

2. [cap.] In entom., same as Hydrophilus. Laporte, 1840.

hydrosomal (hi-drō-sō-mal), a. [hydrosoma + -al.] Of or pertaining to a hydrosoma: as, a hydrosomal expansion; a hydrosomal layer. See extract under Millepora. Also hydrosomatous.

hydrosomata, n. Plural of hydrosoma, 1.

hydrosomatous (hi-drō-sōm'a-tus), a. Same as hydrosomal.

hydrosome (hi-drō-sōm), n. [NL. hydrosoma.] Same as hydrosoma, 1.

hydrosphere (hi-drō-sfēr), n. [Gr. ὑδωρ (hōp), water, + σφαῖρα, sphere.] The aqueous envelop of the globe. The term is used in contradistinction to atmosphere, to designate the moisture which the atmosphere always contains, and which therefore surrounds the globe, just as the atmosphere itself does. (Rare.)

hydrosphere (hi-drō-sfēr), n. [Gr. ὑδωρ (hōp), water, + σφαῖρα, a coil, a spire.] One of a system of lamellar tubes which lie between and below the ambulacra of some erinoids, supposed to have been connected with the respiratory function.

Pores on the ambulacral surface may be, . . . as in Pseudocrinus, Echinocrinus and other genera, slit-like, and arranged to form pectinated rhombs or hydrospires, the two halves of each rhomb being on separate plates.

Encyc. Brit., VII. 638.

Hydrostachydeæ (hi-drō-stā-kid'ē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (S. de Jussieu), < Hydrostachys (-yd- + -eæ).] A tribe of dicotyledonous apetalous plants, of the natural order Podostemaceæ, containing the single genus Hydrostachys. Also Hydrostachyææ.

Hydrostachys (hi-drōs'tā-kis), n. [NL. (Dupleit Thouars), < Gr. ὑδωρ (hōp), water, + στάχυς, an ear of corn.] A small genus of aquatic herbs, of the natural order Podostemaceæ, the type of the tribe Hydrostachydeæ. It has dicious flowers in dense spikes; the flowers naked; the male with 1 stamen, the female with a 1-celled ovary and 2 parietal placentæ; stem tubular; and leaves long, dilated at the base, and simply pinnatifid or pinnatisect. About 9 species are known, natives of Madagascar and Africa.

hydrostat (hi-drō-stāt), n. [Gr. ὑδροστάτης, a hydrostatic balance: see hydrostatic.] 1. An apparatus of any kind for preventing the explosion of steam-boilers.—2. An electrical device for detecting the presence of water, used as a protection against damage to buildings from overflow or leakage.

The first hydrostat I constructed consisted of two sets of conductors running at angles to each other, and separated by a material which would act as an insulator when dry and become a conductor when wet.

Jour. Franklin Inst., CXXVI. 331.

hydrostatic (hi-drō-stāt'ik), a. [= F. hydrostatique = Sp. hidrostatico = Pg. hidrostatico = It. idrostatico, < NL. hydrostaticus (NGR. ὑδροστατικός), hydrostatic, < Gr. ὑδροστάτης, a hydrostatic balance, < ὑδωρ (hōp), water, + στάσις, standing, < σταῖω, causing to stand: see static.] Pertaining to or in accordance with the principles of the equilibrium of fluids; relating to hydrostatics. Also hydrostatical.—Hydrostatic aculephs. See Hydrostatica.—Hydrostatic arch, a linear arch suited for sustaining at each point a normal pressure, proportional, like the pressure of a liquid in repose, to the depth below a given horizontal plane.—Hydrostatic balance, a balance used for determining accurately the specific gravity of bodies by weighing them in water.—Hydrostatic bed. Same as water-bed.—Hydrostatic bellows, an apparatus contrived to illustrate the law of the distribution of pressure through liquids, viz. that when any part of the surface of a confined liquid is pressed by any force, every part of the surface of the confining vessel equal in area to that part of the liquid is pressed by an equal force. It generally consists of two circular boards connected by leather fastened closely round their edges, as in an ordinary bellows, and having a small upright tube communicating with the interior. If a quantity of water is poured into the bellows, and a weight is placed upon the upper board, the water in the tube will rise above the level of the water in the bellows; but a point will be reached where (on account of the above-mentioned principle) the pressure caused by the weight of the small quantity of water in the tube will balance that of the water in the bellows and of the weight: the higher the water in the tube the greater the weight that will be sustained by it. See hydraulic press, under hydraulic.—Hydrostatic joint, a joint used for large water-mains, and consisting essentially of a ring of sheetlead, which is driven into the bell of the pipe by pressure applied to a liquid in an annular space within the bell. The liquid commonly used is tar, and it is left in the pipe after the joint is closed.—Hydrostatic paradox, the principle that any quantity of a perfect liquid, however small, may be made to balance any weight, however great. See hydraulic bellows, above.—Hydrostatic press. Same as hydraulic press (which see, under hydraulic).—Hydrostatic weighing-machine, a machine operating upon the same hydrostatic principle as the hydrostatic bellows, which latter may be considered as such a machine. The weight of a body is indicated by or inferred from the height of a column of distilled water, at a temperature of 4° C., which holds the body to be weighed in equilibrium.

Hydrostatica (hi-drō-stat'ikā), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of hydrostaticus: see hydrostatic.] In Cuvier's system of classification, the second order of Acalepha, distinguished from the simple aculephs by having one or more vessels filled with air, by means of which they suspend themselves in the water. The term is not now used; the group corresponds to the Siphonophora or oceanic hydrozoans, orders Physophora and Calyculophora.

hydrostatical (hi-drō-stat'ik-al), a. [hydrostatic + -al.] Same as hydrostatic.

But this scarce evitable imperfection of hydrostatical and the like experiments does not hinder, but that by their help we may make good estimates of the weights and bulks of very many bodies.

Boyle, Works, V. 465.

hydrostatically (hi-drō-stat'ik-al-i), adv. According to hydrostatics or to hydrostatic principles.

hydrostatician (hi-drō-stā-tish'an), n. [hydrostatic + -ian. Cf. statician.] One who is versed in hydrostatics.

It is known to hydrostaticians that, according to the orem of Archimedes, the weight of a body belonging to that kind may be gathered from the weight of the water that is equal in magnitude to that part of the body that is immersed in that liquor, when the solid floats freely upon it.

Boyle, Works, VI. 482.

hydrostatics (hi-drō-stat'iks), n. [Pl. of hydrostatic: see -ics.] The mathematical theory of the pressure and equilibrium of incompressible fluids.

hydrostomia (hi-drō-stō-mi-ā), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑδωρ (hōp), water, + στόμα, mouth.] In pathol., excessive secretion of fluids into the mouth. The Lancet, No. 3413, p. 161.

hydrosudopathy (hi-drō-sū-dop'a-thi), n. [Irreg. < Gr. ὑδωρ (hōp), water, + ἰδρῶς, sweat (sudar, n., sweating), + Gr. πάθος, suffering: see hydropathy.] The treatment of diseases by cold water and sweating.

hydrosulphid (hi-drō-sul'fid), n. [hydro(gen) + sulphid.] Same as sulphid.

hydrosulphuret (hi-drō-sul'fū-ret), n. [hydro(gen) + sulphuret.] Same as sulphid or sulphuret.

hydrosulphuretted, hydrosulphuretted (hi-drō-sul'fū-ret-ed), a. [hydro-sulphuret + -ed.] Combined with sulphuretted hydrogen.

hydrosulphurous (hi-drō-sul'fēr-us), a. [hydro(gen) + sulphur + -ous.] Compounded of hydrogen and sulphur.—Hydrosulphurous acid, hypsulphurous acid, H₂SO₂.

Hydrostatic Bellows.
a, funnel-mouthed tube; b, box with flexible sides; c, weight.

hydrotachylite (hi-drō-tak'ī-lit), n. [Gr. ὑδωρ (hōp), water, + E. tachylite.] A variety of tachylite containing as much as 15 per cent. of water.

hydrotalcite (hi-drō-tal'sit), n. [Gr. ὑδωρ (hōp), water, + E. talcite.] In mineral, same as houghtite.

hydrotellurate (hi-drō-tel'ū-rāt), n. [hydro-tellur(ic) + -ate.] In chem., a salt formed by the combination of an acid composed of hydrogen and tellurium with a salifiable base.

hydrotelluric (hi-drō-te-lū'rik), a. [hydro-(gen) + tellur(um) + -ic.] Of, pertaining to, or obtained from hydrogen and tellurium.

hydrotheca (hi-drō-thē'kā), n.; [Gr. ὑδροθήκη, a reservoir of water, < ὑδωρ (hōp), water, + θήκη, a case, receptacle: see theca.] In zool., a little chitinous cup in which each polypite of the Sertularida and Campanularida is protected; a calycul. See cut under Campanularia.

In many Hydrozoa, the ectoderm gives rise to a hard cuticular coating, and in some of these (Campanularida, Sertularia), this cuticular investment, on the hydranth, takes the shape of a case or "cell"—the hydrotheca—into which the hydranth may be more or less completely retracted.

Huxley, Anat. Invert., p. 117.

hydrothecal (hi-drō-thē'kal), a. [hydrotheca + -al.] Having the character of hydrotheca; calycular.

hydrotherapeutic (hi-drō-ther-a-pū'tik), a. [Gr. ὑδωρ (hōp), water, + E. therapeutic.] Of or pertaining to hydrotherapeutics: as, hydrotherapeutic treatment.

hydrotherapeutics (hi-drō-ther-a-pū'tiks), n. [Pl. of hydrotherapeutic: see -ics.] The use of water in various ways and at various temperatures for therapeutic purposes.

hydrotherapy (hi-drō-ther'a-pi), n. [= F. hydrothérapie = Sp. hidroterapia, < Gr. ὑδωρ (hōp), water, + θεραπεία, cure, < θεραπεύω, cure.] Same as hydrotherapeutics.

hydrothermal (hi-drō-thēr'mal), a. [Gr. ὑδωρ (hōp), water, + θερμικός, hot.] Of or relating to heated water: specifically applied to the action of heated waters in producing geological changes by dissolving mineral substances and redepositing them when cooled.

hydrothorax (hi-drō-thō'raks), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑδωρ (hōp), water, + θώραξ, the chest.] In pathol., the presence of serous fluid in one or both pleural cavities.

hydrotic (hi-drō'tik), a. and n. [F. hydrotique, < Gr. ὑδρῶν, moisture, < ὑδωρ (hōp), water.] I. a. Causing a discharge of water.

II. n. In med., a hydragogue.

hydrotical (hi-drō'tik-al), a. [hydrotic + -al.] Same as hydrotic.

hydrotimeter (hi-drō-tim'e-tēr), n. [Irreg. < Gr. ὑδρῶν, moisture, + μέτρον, a measure.] An instrument used in the determination of the hardness of water. It consists of a tube so graduated that an alcoholic soap-solution of standard strength contained in 23 divisions of it shall give a permanent lather with 40 cubic centimeters of a solution of calcium chloride of standard strength. Each one of these divisions is called a degree, and in saying that "the water does not exceed 8 degrees hydrotimeter," it is meant that not more than 8 divisions of the standard soap-solution delivered from the hydrotimeter is necessary to make a permanent lather with 40 cubic centimeters of the water in question.

hydrotitanite (hi-drō-ti'tan-it), n. [Gr. ὑδωρ (hōp), water, + E. titanite, q. v.] A hydrated alteration product of the perovskite of Magnet Cove in Arkansas.

hydrotrophe (hi-drō-trōp'hē), n. [Gr. ὑδωρ (hōp), water, + τρέφειν, thicken, congeal, nourish.] An apparatus for raising water by means of condensing steam in chambers. It is similar in principle to the pulsometer, aquometer, etc. E. H. Knight.

hydrotropism (hi-drō-trōp'izm), a. [Gr. ὑδωρ (hōp), water, + τρόπος, a turn.] Pertaining to or affected by hydrotropism.

hydrotropism (hi-drō'trō-pizm), n. [As hydrotrop-ic + -ism.] A state induced in a growing organ by the influence of moisture, in which under certain conditions it turns toward the moisture, and under other little understood conditions it turns away from the moisture. Organs which curve so as to apply themselves to the moist surfaces are termed positively hydrotropic; those which are induced to curve away from the dampness are termed negatively hydrotropic.

hydrous (hi'drus), a. [Gr. ὑδωρ (hōp), water, + -ous.] 1. Containing water; watery.—2. Containing hydrogen.

hydroxid, hydroxide (hi-drōk'sid.-sid or -sid), n. [Gr. ὑδωρ (hōp), water, + E. acid.] A metallic or basic radical combined with one or (see Hygeia), + -an.] 1. Relating to Hygeia, the goddess of health.—2. [l. c.] Pertaining to health or to its preservation. Also hygiean.

hygieolatry (hi-jē-ol'-a-tri), n. [Gr. hygieia, health, + latreia, worship.] The worship of health or of hygiene. [Rare.]

His voice, I think, would have been loudest in the denunciation of that hygieolatry which threatens to become our only religion. P. P. Cobbs, Contemporary Rev., LII. 804.

hygeist, n. See hygeist.

hygiology (hi-jē-ol'-o-ji), n. Same as hygiology.

hyght, a. An obsolete spelling of high.

hyghet, v. and n. An obsolete variant of hie.

Chaucer.

hygiean, a. See hygeian, 2.

hygeist (hi-jē'-ist), n. [Gr. hygieia, health (see Hygeia), + -ist.] One versed in hygiene or the science of health. Also spelled hygeist.

hygienal (hi-jē-n'-al), a. [Formerly hygieinal; < hygiene + -al.] Relating to hygiene or the preservation of health.

Presenting some things relating to the hygienal part of physics. Boyle, Works, II. 103.

hygiene (hi'-jē-n), n. [F. hygiène = Sp. higiene = Pg. hygienia, hygiene = It. igiene = D. G. Sw. hygiene = Dan. Hygieine, irreg. < Gr. hygieinē, be healthy, sound, < hygie, healthy, sound: see Hygeia.] That department of medical knowledge which concerns the preservation of health; a system of principles or rules designed for the promotion of health; sanitary science.

hygienic (hi-jē-n'-ik), a. [F. hygiénique; as hygiene + -ic.] Relating to hygiene; pertaining to health or the science of health.

How small a proportion of them die before the age of maturity, in the present state of hygienic knowledge. J. S. Mill.

Medication without insuring favorable hygienic conditions is like amputation without ligatures.

O. W. Holmes, Med. Essays, p. 203.

hygienically (hi-jē-n'-i-kal-i), adv. In a hygienic manner; in accordance with the laws of health.

hygienics (hi-jē-n'-iks), n. [Pl. of hygienic; see -ics.] The art of maintaining health; hygiene; sanitary science.

So many books have been written on the care of the health, and so much attention has been called to hygienics within a few years. J. F. Clarke, Self-Culture, p. 66.

hygienism (hi'-jē-n'-izm), n. [From hygiene + -ism.] Same as hygienics. Imp. Dict.

hygienist (hi'-jē-n'-ist), n. [From hygiene + -ist.] One who is versed in hygiene.

The business of the hygienist and of the physician is to know the range of these modifiable conditions (such as are capable of being indefinitely modified by our own actions), and how to influence them toward the maintenance of health and the prolongation of life. Huxley, Pop. Sci. Mo., XI. 669.

hygiology (hi-jē-ol'-o-ji), n. [*Prop. hygiology, < Gr. hygieia, health, + -λογία, < λέγω, speak: see Hygeia and -ology.] The art of the preservation of health. Science, VI. 512. Also spelled hygiology.

hygrine (hi'-grin), n. [Gr. hygrós, wet, moist, + -ine.] A liquid and volatile alkaloid obtained from coca-leaves. It forms crystallizable salts with acids.

hygro- [Lt. etc., hygro-, < Gr. hygrós, wet, moist, running, fluid, akin to L. uenens (for uignens*), moist, < uvere, be moist: see humid, humor, etc.] An element in compound words of Greek origin, meaning 'wet,' 'moist.'

hygroblepharic (hi-grō-blef'-a-rik), a. [Gr. hygrós, wet, moist, + βλέφαρον, eyelid.] Pertaining to the moisture of, or serving to moisten, the eyelids: applied especially to the ducts of the lacrymal gland which discharge tears.

hygrodeik (hi'-grō-dik), n. [Irreg. < Gr. hygrós, wet, moist, + δεικνύω, show.] A form of hygrometer consisting of a wet-bulb and a dry-bulb thermometer (see thermometer and psychrometer) supported one on each side of a frame on which is drawn an appropriate scale. The humidity is indicated by the extremity of an index whose position is determined by the heights of the two mercury-columns.

Hygrogeophila (hi'-grō-jē-ol'-i-lā), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. hygrós, wet, moist, + γῆ, the earth, + φίλος, loving.] Same as Geohydrophila.

hydrograph (hi'-grō-gráf), n. [Gr. hygrós, wet, moist, + γράφω, write.] An instrument which registers automatically the variations in the moisture of the atmosphere.

hygrology (hi-grōl'-o-ji), n. [Gr. hygrós, wet, moist, + -λογία, < λέγω, speak: see -ology.] That part of medical science which treats of the humors of the body.

hygroma (hi-grō-mā), n.; pl. hygromata (-mā-tā). [NL., < Gr. hygrós, wet, moist, + -ωμα.] In pathol., a swelling with serous contents, such as lymphangioma, bursæ mucosæ distended with lymph, etc.

hygromatous (hi-grom'-a-tus), a. [From hygroma (t) + -ous.] Of the nature of or affected with hygroma.

hygrometer (hi-grom'-e-tēr), n. [Gr. hygrós, wet, moist, + μέτρον, a measure.] An instrument for measuring the amount of the moisture of the atmosphere, or more accurately for determining the hygrometric state or relative humidity, which is the ratio between the actual amount of water-vapor present in the air and that required in order to saturate it completely. A common form is the Daniell hygrometer, which consists of a bent glass tube terminating in two bulbs, one covered with muslin, the other of black glass and containing ether and a thermometer. Either being dropped on the muslin of the upper bulb, the vapor within is condensed, and the consequent evaporation of the ether from the other bulb cools the air about it, and finally to such a degree that moisture is deposited upon its black surface. The dropping is now suspended, and the temperature is taken from the enclosed thermometer; the mean between this temperature and that observed when the moisture disappears is the dew-point. The hygrometric state is the ratio between the pressure of water-vapor corresponding respectively to the dew-point and to the temperature of the air at the time as given by the thermometer on the stand. This form is called a dew-point or condensing hygrometer. Instead of a black glass bulb, a silver vessel is sometimes used, as in Regnault's hygrometer. In the chemical hygrometer a known volume of air is passed over some hygroscopic substance, as calcium chloride, contained in a drying-tube. This absorbs the aqueous vapor, and by its increase in weight gives the means of calculating the amount present in the unit of volume. The wet bulb thermometer, or psychrometer (see psychrometer), also gives a simple method of obtaining the hygrometric state, by means of appropriately constructed tables.

hygrometric (hi-grō-met'-rik), a. [As hygrometer + -ic.] 1. Pertaining to hygrometry; relating to or depending upon the amount of moisture in the atmosphere.

The rate of evaporation is greatly affected by the hygrometric state of the air. Huxley, Physiography, p. 68.

2. Readily absorbing and retaining moisture: as, hygrometric substances or plants.—Hygrometric balance, a popular form of hygroscope designed to afford a rough indication of weather changes.—Hygrometric state. See humidity and hygrometer.

hygrometrical (hi-grō-met'-ri-kal), a. [From hygrometric + -al.] Same as hygrometric.

hygrometry (hi-grom'-e-tri), n. [As hygrometer + -y.] That branch of physics which relates to the determination of the humidity of bodies, especially of the moisture in the atmosphere, embracing also the theory and use of such instruments as have been invented for this purpose.

To get materials for further advance, astronomy requires . . . the direct aid of an advanced optics, of barology, of thermology, of hygrometry.

H. Spencer, Universal Progress, p. 186.

hygrophanous (hi-grō-f'-anus), a. [Gr. hygrós, wet, moist, + φανής, < φαίνω, show.] In bot., transparent, or like water, when moist, and opaque when dry.

Hygrophila (hi-grōf'-i-lā), n. [NL. (Robert Brown, 1810), fem. sing., < Gr. hygrós, wet, moist, + φίλος, loving.] A genus of dicotyledonous gamopetalous plants, of the natural order Acanthaceæ and tribe Ruellieæ, and the type of the subtribe Hygrophileæ. It is characterized by a calyx of 5 narrow, nearly equal divisions; a bilabiate corolla; 4 perfect didynamous stamens; opposite sessile leaves; and axillary sessile or subsessile flowers. The plants are erect or diffuse herbs. A few of them have infra-axillary spines.

Fourteen species are known, from the tropical or subtropical parts of the world.

Hygrophila² (hi-grōf'-i-lā), n. pl. [NL. (Feruscoe, 1821), neut. pl., < Gr. hygrós, wet, moist, + φίλος, loving.] A suborder of pulmoniferous gastropods, including the basomatoporphorous fresh-water family Limnæida, etc.

Hygrophilææ (hi-grōf'-i-lā), n. pl. [NL. (Nees von Esenbeck, 1832), < *Hygrophila*¹ + -ææ.] A subtribe of plants of the natural order Acanthaceæ, tribe Ruellieæ, typified by the genus Hygrophila, characterized by a 2-lipped corolla, and by having the filaments laterally united in pairs by their bases.

Hygrophorus (hi-grōf'-ō-rus), n. [NL. (E. Fries, 1838), < MGr. hygrophoros, carrying water, < Gr. hygrós, wet, moist, + φορέω, < φέρω = E. bear.] A genus of hymenomycetous fungi, allied to the agarics, from which they differ in their peculiar habit, and their waxy (not membranaceous) gills and granular intermediate substance. Many of the species are exceedingly brilliant in coloring, which, however, is not a constant character. H. conicus, for example, ranging in color from yellow to scarlet.

hygroplasma (hi-grō-plaz'-mā), n. [NL., < Gr. hygrós, wet, moist, + πλάσμα, anything formed.] In bot., a term proposed by Naegeli for the fluid part of protoplasm. Compare stereoplasma.

hygroscope (hi'-grō-skōp), n. [Gr. hygrós, wet, moist, + σκοπεῖν, view.] An instrument or apparatus in which the hygrosopic property of some substance is employed for indicating approximately the humidity of the air, without attempting its accurate measurement. The most noted hygroscope is that of Saussure (in which called the hair hygrometer), in which a prepared human hair, which expands or contracts in length according as the air is more or less moist, is made to move an index over a scale graduated from 0 to 100. By an adjusting-screw the index may be set at 100 whenever the air in the case is known to be saturated, and a fiducial point on the scale is thereby maintained.

hygrosopic (hi-grō-skōp'-ik), a. [From hygroscope + -ic.] 1. Pertaining to the hygroscope; perceptible or capable of being detected only by the hygroscope.

—2. Having the property of absorbing moisture from the atmosphere, as hygrosopic tissue, or of becoming coated with a film of moisture.

However dry the air may appear to be, it always contains more or less . . . moisture. Though not recognized by the senses, its presence is readily revealed by the behaviour of certain substances which greedily absorb moisture, and are consequently said to be hygrosopic.

Huxley, Physiography, p. 66.

3. In bot., sensitive to moisture; caused by moisture; moving when moistened and then dried, as the elaters of Equisetum or the peristome of mosses.

We may illustrate what we mean by the hygrosopic movements of plants: if the tissues on one side of an organ permit of rapid evaporation, they will dry quickly and contract, causing the part to bend to this side.

Darwin, Movement in Plants, p. 489.

hygrosopical (hi-grō-skōp'-i-kal), a. [From hygroscope + -al.] Same as hygrosopic.

hygrosopicity (hi'-grō-skō-pis'-i-ti), n. [From hygroscope + -ity.] In bot., the character of being hygrosopic; the property possessed by vegetable tissues of absorbing or discharging moisture, and expanding or shrinking accordingly.

hygrostatics (hi-grō-stat'-iks), n. [Gr. hygrós, moist, + στατικός, causing to stand: see static, statics.] The science or art of measuring degrees of moisture.

Hygrotrechus (hi-grō-trē'-kus), n. [NL. (Stål, 1867), < Gr. hygrós, wet, moist, + τρέχω, run.] A genus of water-bugs of the heteropterous family Hydrobatidae. H. remigia is the most common North American species, of a brown color, frequently seen running over the surface of the water of ponds and streams.

hyke¹, n. Same as huke.

hyke² (hik), n. Same as *haik*².

Hyla (hi'lā), n. [NL., < Gr. ὕλη, a wood, a forest, woodland, copse, wood cut down, firewood, timber, stuff, material, matter (cf. E. matter, ult. < L. materia), prob. orig. ὑλῆ* = L. silva, silva, a wood: see silvan.] A genus of tree-toads of the family Hylidae, instituted by Laurenti in 1768. The species are numerous. H. versicolor is so called from the chameleon-like color-changes it undergoes. H. pickeri is a common species

Hair Hygrometer of Saussure.
c, the hair supported by the clamp a, adjusted by the screw b, and stretched over the pulley e by the weight f.

of the United States, the shrill piping of which is heard in early spring. H. arborea is a European species.

hylactism (hi-lak'tizm), n. [Gr. ὑλακτεῖν, bark (< ὑλᾶν, bark), + -ism.] A barking or baying. [Rare.]

There are turkeys, too, . . . and two or three dogs, who bark with a sharp hylactism. Shelley, Letters, p. 64.

Hyladæ (hi-lā-dē), n. pl. See Hylidæ.

hylaosaur (hi-lē-ō-sār), n. [Gr. ὑλαοσαύρος, q. v.] A gigantic fossil lizard, of the genus Hylaosaurus.

Hylaosaurus (hi-lē-ō-sā'rus), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑλαος, of the wood or forest (< ὕλη, a wood: see Hyla), + σαῦρος, lizard.] A genus of gigantic dinosaurs, established upon remains discovered by Mantell in the Wealden formation of Tilgate Forest in England, and characterized by the development of the dermal scutes into prodigious spines along the middle line of the back. One of these great lizards was probably about 25 feet long.

Hylaplesia (hi-lā-plē'si-ā), n. [NL., < Gr. ὕλη, a wood, + πλησιός, near, close to.] A genus of tropical American frog-like toads, typical of the family Hylaplesiidae. The species are very prettily or brightly colored; they are such as H. tinctoria, H. picta, and H. speciosa, the latter living in the Andes of the United States of Colombia at a height of 6,000 feet above the sea. Boie, 1827.

Hylaplesiidae (hi-lā-plē'si-ā-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Hylaplesia + -idae.] A family of batrachians, named from the genus Hylaplesia, having the sacral apophyses not flattened, the toes all free and dilated at the ends, perfect ears, and no neck-glands. The few species are confined to tropical America. Also Hylaplesiidae. Synonymous with Dendrobatiidae.

hyle¹, v. A Middle English form of heald.

hyle², a. A Middle English form of held, preterit of hold.

hyleg (hi'leg), n. [Of Ar. origin.] In astrology, the planet which rules the particular sign of the zodiac which happens at the instant of a nativity to be in the ascendant, or first twelfth part of the heavens above the eastern horizon; the apheia, prorogator, significator, or giver of life. Also spelled hileg.

hylephobia (hi-lē-fō'bi-ā), n. [Gr. ὕλη, matter, + -φοβία, fear: cf. hydrophobia.] Morbid fear of materialism; dread of the result of materialistic doctrines. [Rare.]

Hylephobia is now often regarded as a sacred madness, as epilepsy used to be.

G. S. Hall, Amer. Jour. Psychol., Nov., 1887, p. 152.

hylicism (hi-li'sizm), n. Same as hylism.

hylacist (hi-li'sist), n. A materialist; specifically, one of the early Ionic philosophers.

Hylidæ (hi-li-dē), n. pl. [NL.; improp. Hyladæ, < Hyla + -idae.] A family of ariferous salient amphibians, named from the genus Hyla, having maxillary teeth, dilated sacral diapophyses, and dilated terminal phalanges. The species are commonly called tree-toads or tree-frogs. The limits of the family have varied widely with different writers. The very obvious character of the dilated disk-like ends of the toes is by no means peculiar to the Hylidæ, and has caused various toads and frogs, some even of a different suborder of batrachians, to be erroneously referred to this family. Elimination of all such greatly restricts the family, conformably to the definition here given.

hylism (hi'lizm), n. [Gr. ὕλη, matter (see Hyla), + -ism.] In metaph.: (a) Materialism; specifically, the doctrines of the early Ionic philosophers. (b) The theory which regards matter as the principle of evil. Also hylicism.

hyll. An obsolete spelling of hill.

hylobate (hi-lō-bāt), n. [Gr. ὑλοβάτης.] A member of the genus Hylobates or subfamily Hylobatinae; a long-armed ape or gibbon.

Hylobates (hi-lōb'ā-tēz), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑλοβάτης, one who haunts the woods, < ὕλη, a wood, forest, + βάτης, one who mounts, < βαίνειν, go.] 1. A genus of anthropoid apes, the gibbons or long-armed apes, typical of the subfamily Hylobatinae. It usually includes all the gibbons, being thus continuous with the subfamily, but the siamang is sometimes separated from the rest under the genus Siamanga. There are several true species of Hylobates, such as H. lar. See ape and gibbon. Illiger, 1811.

2. A genus of coleopterous insects. Dejean, 1833.

Hylobatinæ (hi-lōb'ā-ti'nē), n. pl. [NL., < Hylobates + -inæ.] A subfamily of anthropoid apes, of the family Simiidae, typified by the genus Hylobates, containing the gibbons. They are characterized by their very slender form with extremely long limbs (especially the arms), and the presence of ischial callosities.

hylobatine (hi-lōb'ā-tin), a. and n. I. a. Of or relating to the Hylobatinae, or having their characters.

II. n. One of the Hylobatinae.

Hylobius (hi-lō'bi-us), n. [NL. (Germer), < Gr. ὕλη, wood, + βίος, life.] A notable genus of weevils, of the family Curculionidae. The species live in wood. H. abietis is destructive to firs and other conifers.

Hylocharis (hi-lōk'ā-ris), n. [NL., < Gr. ὕλη, wood, forest, + χαίρειν, rejoice.] A genus of humming-birds, based by Boie in 1831 upon one of the sapphirs, Trochilus sapphirinus. The name was subsequently applied by various authors to several different groups of Trochilidae.

Hylocichla (hi-lō-sik'lā), n. [NL. (Baird, 1864), < Gr. ὕλη, wood, + κίχλη, a bird like the thrush.] A genus of Turdidae, including the American wood-thrushes. The type is the common wood-thrush, H. ustulata; other abundant and well-known species of the United States are Wilson's thrush or veery, the olive-backed thrush, and the hermit-thrush. See wood-thrush, veery.

Hyloides¹ (hi-lō'dēz), n. [NL., < Gr. ὕλδης, woody, wooded (of the wood), < ὕλη, wood, + εἶδος, form.] A genus of Australian birds: now called Drymodes. J. Gould, 1841.

Hyloides² (hi-lō'dēz), n. [NL., < Hyla + Gr. εἶδος, form.] A genus of toads, of the family Cystignathidae, containing such species as H. ozyrhynchus of the West Indies. They resemble tree-toads.

hylogenesis (hi-lō-jen'e-sis), n. [Gr. ὕλη, matter, + γενεσις, generation.] The origin of matter.

hylogeny (hi-loj'e-ni), n. [Gr. ὕλη, matter, + -γενεῖα, < γενεή, producing: see -geny.] Same as hylogenesis.

hyloid (hi-lo'id), a. and n. [Gr. ὕλη, matter, + -οῖδ, a. and n.] 1. a. Of or relating to the Hylidæ.

II. n. One of the Hylidæ.

hyloidealism (hi-lō-i-dē'al-izm), n. [Gr. ὕλη, matter, + E. idealism.] The doctrine that reality belongs to the immediate object of belief as such; sensuous subjectivism.

hyloist (hi-lō'ist), n. [*Prop. hylist, < Gr. ὕλη, matter (see Hyla), + -ist.] One who believes matter to be God. Also huloist.

hylogy (hi-lō'j-i), n. [Gr. ὕλη, matter, + -λογία, < λόγος, speak: see -ology.] The doctrine or theory of matter as unorganized. Krauth.

Hylomys (hi-lō-mis), n. [NL., < Gr. ὕλη, wood, + μῦς = E. mouse.] A genus of insectivorous mammals, of the subfamily Gymnura, differing from Gymnura in the shorter tail and smaller third upper premolar. H. suillus is a species formerly wrongly referred to the Tupaiidae. Müller and Schlegel, 1843.

hylopathic (hi-lō-pā-thik), a. [As hylopath-ism + -ic.] Pertaining to hylopathism.

hylopathism (hi-lō-p'ā-thizm), n. [Gr. ὕλη, matter, + πάθος, feeling, + -ism.] The doctrine that matter is sentient.

hylopathist (hi-lō-p'ā-thist), n. [As hylopath-ism + -ist.] A believer in hylopathism.

hylophagous (hi-lō-f'ā-gus), a. [Gr. ὕλοφαγος, eating wood, feeding in the woods, < ὕλη, wood, + φαγεῖν, eat.] Eating wood; xylophagous, as certain beetles.

Hylophilus (hi-lōf'i-lus), n. [NL., < Gr. ὕλη, a wood, + φιλος, loving.] In ornith., a genus of American greenlets, of the family Vireonidae. It differs from Vireo proper in the stouter feet with larger claws and equal lateral toes, more conical bill with straighter culmen, and other characters. The wings are about as long as the tail, and both are rounded. The genus contains upward of 15 species, all of the warmer parts of continental America; H. sclateri is an example. C. J. Temminck, about 1823.

Hylophilus sclateri.

hylotheism (hi-lō-thē-izm), n. [Gr. ὕλη, matter, + θεός, God, + -ism.] The doctrine or belief that matter is God, or that there is no God except matter and the universe. Also hulotheism.

hulotheist (hi-lō-thē-ist), n. [Gr. ὕλοθεῖς + -ist.] One who believes that matter is God. Also hulotheist.

Hylotoma (hi-lōt'ō-mā), n. [NL. (Latreille, 1804), fem. to Hylotomus.] A genus of sawflies, of the family Tenthredinidae, or Hylotomidae. The second and third submarginal cells of the fore wing each receive a recurrent nervure. There are about 25 European and 15 North American species, of rather small size. H. rosea is the rose saw-fly.

Hylotomidae (hi-lō-tōm'ī-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Hylotoma + -idae.] A family of insects, named from the genus Hylotoma: now usually merged in Tenthredinidae.

hylotomous (hi-lōt'ō-mus), a. [Gr. ὕλη, wood, + τομός, cutting, < τέμνω, cut.] Wood-cutting: applied to certain insects which bore into wood.

hylozoic (hi-lō-zō'ik), a. [As hylozo-ism + -ic.] Pertaining to or of the nature of hylozoism.

The nomen which the hylozoic corporealists pay all his devotions to is a certain blind shee-goat or goddess, called Nature, or the life of matter.

Cudworth, Intellectual System, p. 107.

hylozoical (hi-lō-zō'ī-kal), a. [Gr. ὕλοζοος + -al.] Same as hylozoic.

There hath been already mentioned another form of Atheism, called by us hylozoical.

Cudworth, Intellectual System, p. 105.

hylozoism (hi-lō-zō'izm), n. [Gr. ὕλη, matter, + ζῶω, animal, + -ism.] The doctrine that all matter is endowed with life.

Hylozoism makes all body, as such, and therefore every smallest atom of it, to have life essentially belonging to it. Cudworth, Intellectual System, p. 105.

When we have attained to this conception of hylozoism, of a living material universe, the mystery of Nature is solved. Pop. Sci. Mo., XXII, 169.

hylozoist (hi-lō-zō'ist), n. [As hylozo-ism + -ist.] A believer in hylozoism; one who holds that matter, and every particle of it, has a species of life or animation.

The hylozoists, by Cudworth's account of them, ascribed a little more to their atoms, imagining them endued with a quality which, though not perception, might be stilled the seed or principle whereof by the junction of many of them together perception might be completed. A. Tucker, Light of Nature, II, i. 9.

The hylozoist can attribute consciousness to the falling stone, while Descartes denied it to even the highest brutes. McK. Cattell, Mind, XIII, 436.

hylozoistic (hi-lō-zō'is'tik), a. [Gr. ὕλοζοος + -ic.] Of or pertaining to hylozoism or the hylozoists: as, the hylozoistic conception of the universe.

A Monism that—though essentially based on hylozoistic assumptions—pretends, nevertheless, to explain everything in strict keeping with mechanical principles. The Open Court, March 17, 1887.

hylozoistically (hi-lō-zō'is'ti-kal-i), adv. After the manner of the hylozoists; in accordance with hylozoistic doctrines.

Hymen¹ (hi'men), n. [L., < Gr. ὕμην (ὑμεν-), the god of marriage; origin obscure.] 1. In Gr. myth., the god of marriage, son of Bacchus and Aphrodite (Venus), or of Apollo and one of the Muses, in some legends originally a mortal youth, invoked in hymeneal songs for reasons variously given. Also called Hymeneus.

Here's eight that must take hands To join in Hymen's bands.

Shak., As you Like it, v. 4.

They light the nuptial torch, and bid invoke Hymen, then first to marriage rites invoked. Milton, P. L., xl, 501.

Hence—2. Marriage; the wedded state. [Poetical or archaic.]

We'll have all, sir, that may make your Hymen high and happy. B. Jonson, Epicoene, iii. 2.

To whose bounty Owe we our thanks for gracing thus our hymen? Massinger, Renegade, v. 3.

Would this same mock-love, and this Mock-Hymen, were laid up like winter bats, Till all men grew to rate us at our worth.

Tennyson, Princess, iv.

hymen² (hí'men), n. [Gr. ὑμην (hymen), a thin skin, a membrane.] A membrane. Specifically—(a) In anat., a fold of mucous membrane stretched across and partly closing the external orifice of the vagina. (b) In conch., the ligament between the opposite valves of a bivalve shell.

Hymenaea (hi-me-né'á), n. [NL. (so called in allusion to the fact that the leaf is formed of a pair of leaflets), fem. of L. Hymeneus, relating to the god of marriage: see *Hymen*¹.] A genus of trees of the tribe Amherstieae, of the natural order Leguminosae. They have leathery leaves, each of 2 leaflets, rather large white flowers in short densely corymbose terminal panicles, and thick oblong or ovate pods. About 8 species are known, all natives of tropical America. H. Courbaril grows to an enormous size, and lives to a very great age, some of the extant individuals being supposed to be older than the Christian era. The heartwood is very hard and tough, and is hence much valued for wheel-work, particularly for cogs. It is also valuable for posts, rails, and gates. It takes a fine polish, and is so heavy that a cubic foot weighs about 100 pounds. A valuable resin exudes from the trunk. It is known in the West Indies as the locust-tree or varnish-tree, and in Panama as algarroba. Six extinct species of this genus have been described from the Cretaceous of Bohemia, and one from the Miocene of Croatia.

Hymenaea Courbaril.

Hymenaic (hi-me-né'á'ik), a. [LL. Hymenaicus (cf. Gr. ὑμναϊος), < Gr. ὑμην, Hymen: see *Hymen*¹.] Pertaining to Hymen; used to invoke the god Hymen, as in hymeneal songs or epithalamia.—Hymenaic meter, a dactylic dimeter acatalectic (— — — —).

Hymenantha (hí'men-an-thé'rā), n. [NL. (Robert Brown, 1818), referring to the scales borne by the anthers, < Gr. ὑμην, a membrane, + NL. anthera, an anther.] A small genus of rigid shrubs or small trees, of the natural order Violariaceae and tribe Alsodieae. They have small, axillary, frequently polygamous flowers, with the sepals and petals nearly equal, the latter short; anthers almost sessile, united in a tube around the pistil, and bearing on the back a erect scale; placentas of the ovary 2 or rarely 3, each bearing 1 ovule; and the leaves alternate, often clustered. Only 4 species are known, natives of Australia or New Zealand. H. dentata, the scrub-boxwood, is a much-branched shrub often many feet in height. H. Banksii is a tall spiny shrub, well adapted for close hedges. It bears a profusion of very fragrant flowers.

Hymenanthereae (hí'men-an-thé'rē), n. pl. [NL. (Reichenbach, 1837), < Hymenantha + -eae.] A tribe of plants of the natural order Violariaceae, containing the single genus Hymenantha. It is referred by later authors to the tribe Alsodieae.

hymeneal (hi-me-né'al), a. and n. [As hymenean + -al.] I. A pertaining or relating to marriage. Also hymenial.

Chorus hymeneal
Or triumphant shout,
Matched with thine, would be all
But an empty vaunt.

Shelley, To a Skylark, xiv.

It was pleasant to her to be led to the hymeneal altar by a belted earl. Mrs. Gaskell, Wives and Daughters, I. 236.

= Syn. Connubial, Nuptial, etc. See matrimonial.

II. n. A marriage-song.

For her the spouse prepares the bridal ring,
For her white virgins hymeneals sing.
Pope, Eloisa to Abelard, I. 220.

hymenean (hi-me-né'an), a. and n. [OF. hymenean, < L. Hymeneus, Hymeneus, < Gr. ὑμναϊος, belonging to Hymen or marriage: see *Hymen*¹.] I. A pertaining to marriage.

II. n. A marriage-song; an epithalamium.

And heavenly quires the hymenean sung.
Milton, P. L., iv. 711.

hymenia, n. Plural of hymenium.

hymenial¹ (hi-mé'ni-al), a. [Gr. *ὑμενιά + -ial; a var. of hymeneal.] Same as hymeneal.*

hymenial² (hi-mé'ni-al), a. [Gr. *ὑμενιά, or hymenium, + -ial.] 1. In anat., pertaining to the hymen.—2. In bot., belonging to the hymenium.—Hymenial alga or gonidium, in lichenology, the algal cells in a sporocarp.—Hymenial gelatin, an amyloid substance in the hymenia of some lichens.—Hymenial layer. Same as hymenium.*

hymenic (hi-men'ik), a. [Gr. *ὑμενιά + -ic.] Hymeneal.*

hymenicolar (hi-me-nik'ō-lār), a. [NL. hymenium, q. v., + L. colere, inhabit.] In bot., inhabiting the hymenium. Cooke.

hymeniferous (hi-me-nif'ē-rus), a. [NL. hymenium, q. v., + L. ferre = E. *bear*¹.] In bot., provided with a hymenium.

Hymenini (hi-me-ní'ni), n. pl. [NL. (Elias Fries, 1821), < hymenium (which these plants possess) + -ini.] An order of hymenomycetous fungi, containing 8 genera, such as Agaricus, Hydnum, Polyporus, etc. They are placed by later authorities in the families Agaricini, Polyporei, Hydnei, etc.

hymeniphore (hi-me-ní'fōr), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑμην, taken in the sense of hymenium, + -phoros, bearing, < Gr. φέρω = E. *bear*¹.] In bot., the structure or part which bears the hymenium. Sometimes hymenophore, hymenophorum.

hymenitis (hi-me-ní'tis), n. [NL., < *hymen*² + -itis.] In pathol., inflammation of the hymen. hymenium (hi-me-ní'um), n.; pl. hymenia (-i). [NL., < Gr. ὑμην, dim. of ὑμην (hymen), a membrane.] In bot., the fructifying surface in fungi, especially when the spores are naked. It is an aggregation of spore mother-cells with or without sterile cells, in a continuous stratum or layer upon a sporophore. In the common mushroom, Agaricus, for example, the hymenium or spore-bearing surface is naked or exposed, and spread over the gills, covering them on all sides with a delicate membrane, upon which the reproductive organs are developed. Also called hymenial layer. See cuts under apothecium, ascus, and Fungi.

Hymenodictyon (hí'men-ō-dik'ti-on), n. [NL. (Wallich, 1824), so called with ref. to the thin reticulated leaves, < Gr. ὑμην, a membrane, + δίκτυον, a net.] A genus of dicotyledonous gamopetalous trees or shrubs, of the natural order Rubiaceae, tribe Cinchoneae, characterized by having the stigma fusiform, the flowers in branching panicle-like spikes, with foliaceous bracts, and opposite, reticulated, long-petioled leaves. About 5 species are known, natives of tropical Asia and Africa. The bark of H. excelsum of India has been used as a substitute for cinchona bark, but it is of little value. The wood is used for making agricultural implements, etc.

Hymenogaster (hí'men-ō-gas'tēr), n. [NL. (L. R. Tulasne), with ref. to the membranous structure of the interior, < Gr. ὑμην, a membrane, + γαστήρ, stomach.] A genus of fungi, of the subclass Gasteromycetes. It is characterized by having the peridium fleshy or thin; the cavities at first empty, radiating or irregular; trama composed of elongated cells; and spores various. These fungi are globose, fleshy or rather soft, and much like the common puffballs, only smaller.

Hymenogastreæ (hí'men-ō-gas'trē), n. pl. [NL., < Hymenogaster + -eae.] A tribe of fungi, of the subclass Gasteromycetes, typified by the genus Hymenogaster. They may be regarded as an assemblage of the simplest forms of the Gasteromycetes, possessing usually the simple structure of the type, but including also the genera Gautieria, which is without a peridium, and Seotium, which has a central column crossing the body of the fungus. Also written Hymenogastrei and Hymenogasteri.

hymenogeny (hi-me-noj'ē-ni), n. [Gr. ὑμην, a membrane, + -γενεα, < -γενής, producing: see -geny.] The production of membrane as the effect of contact of two liquids, as albumen and fat, when the former gives a coating to the globules of the latter.

hymenography (hi-me-nog'ra-fi), n. [Gr. ὑμην, a membrane, + -γραφία, < γράφω, write.] A description of the membranes of animal bodies.

hymenoid (hí'men-oid), a. [Gr. ὑμενοειδής, membranous, < ὑμην (hymen), a membrane (see *hymen*²), + ειδός, form.] Resembling a hymenium in structure; membranous: applied by Léveillé to certain fungi in which the mycelia are united into a sort of membrane.

hymenolichen (hí'men-ō-lí'ken), n. [Gr. ὑμην (hymen), a membrane, + λεῖχην, lichen.] A lichen having the character of the Hymenomycetes.

hymenological (hí'men-ō-loj'ī-kal), a. [Gr. *ὑμενολογία + -ic.] Of or pertaining to hymenology.*

hymenology (hi-me-nol'ō-jī), n. [Gr. ὑμην (hymen), a membrane, + -λογία, < λέγω, speak: see -ology.] 1. The science or study of the membranes of the animal organism.—2. A treatise on such membranes.

hymenomycetal (hí'men-ō-mi-sé'tal), a. Same as hymenomycetous.

hymenomycete (hí'men-ō-mi'sēt), n. One of the Hymenomycetes.

The sporophore would be thought at first sight to belong to a Peziza rather than to a Hymenomycete.
De Bary, Fungi (trans.), p. 302.

Hymenomycetes (hí'men-ō-mi-sé'tēs), n. pl. [NL. (Elias Fries, 1830), < Gr. ὑμην (hymen), a membrane, + μύκης, pl. μύκητες, a mushroom.] A subclass or an order of fungi, of the group Basidiomycetes, characterized by having a hymenium on the free, exposed surface of the sporo-phore, the compound structure which bears it. It includes the Agaricini (which are typified by the common mushroom), Polyporei, Hydnei, Telephorei, Clavari, and the somewhat anomalous Tremellini, which are gelatinous.

hymenomycetoid (hí'men-ō-mi-sé'toid), a. Same as hymenomycetous.

hymenomycetous (hí'men-ō-mi-sé'tus), a. Pertaining to or having the characters of the Hymenomycetes. Also hymenomycetal, hymenomycetoid.

Hymenopappeæ (hí'men-ō-pap'ē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Cassini), < Hymenopappus + -eae.] A former tribe of composite plants, typified by the genus Hymenopappus: now placed in the tribe Helenioideæ.

Hymenopappus (hí'men-ō-pap'us), n. [NL. (C. L. Héritier de Brutelle, 1788), so called from the hyaline pappus, < Gr. ὑμην (hymen), a membrane, + NL. pappus, q. v.] A genus of composite plants, of the tribe Helenioideæ, the type of the old tribe Hymenopappeæ. The heads are homogamous and discoid, the bracts of the involucre are free, the style-branches are linear and obtuse, and the pappus scales short, obtuse, or nearly equal. They are herbs with radical or alternate pinnatisect leaves, and corymbose white or yellow flower-heads. Seven species are known, all natives of North America.

hymenophore (hí'men-ō-fōr), n. Same as hymenophore.

Hymenophoreæ (hí'men-ō-fō-rē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Presl, 1836), as hymenophorum + -eae.] A division of ferns, not now recognized, including the tribes Aspidiaceæ, Aspleniaceæ, etc.

hymenophorum (hi-me-nof'ō-rum), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑμην, a membrane, + -φόρος, < φέρω = E. *bear*¹.] Same as hymenophore.

Hymenophyllaceæ (hí'men-ō-fil-lā-sē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Gaudichaud-Beaupré, 1826), so called in allusion to the filmy nature of the frond, < Gr. ὑμην (hymen), a membrane, + φύλλον, a leaf.] A family of homosporous ferns. It is characterized by having the sporangia borne on an elongated, often filiform, receptacle, surrounded by a complete transverse ring opening vertically; sori terminal or marginal from the apex of a vein; indusium inferior, usually of the same texture as the frond; fronds delicately membranous and pellucid. There are only 2 genera, Hymenophyllum and Trichomanes, and about 175 species, mostly confined to the tropics.

hymenophyllaceous (hí'men-ō-fil-lā'shius), a. Having the appearance or characters of the Hymenophyllaceæ.

Hymenophyllæ (hí'men-ō-fil'ē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Endlicher, 1833), < Hymenophyllum + -eae.] A name originally employed to designate a tribe of ferns, but including the same genera as the Hymenophyllaceæ.

Hymenophyllum (hí'men-ō-fil'um), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑμην (hymen), a membrane, + φύλλον = L. folium, a leaf.] A genus of usually small and sometimes very minute ferns, including a large number of species with filmy pellucid fronds, found chiefly in hot and damp tropical forests; the filmy ferns or lace-ferns. It is closely allied to the genus Trichomanes, from which it differs in having the two valves of the involucre separate and not blended into a cup. None is found in North America. Two extinct species of this genus have been described from the Carboniferous of Europe, one from the Cretaceous of Kansas, and one from the Laramie group of Colorado. H. Tunbridgeense, the Tunbridge fern, is a native of England.

hymenopter (hi-me-nop'tēr), n. A hymenomycetous insect; one of the Hymenoptera. Also hymenopteran.

Hymenoptera (hi-me-nop'tē-rā), n. pl. [NL. (Linnaeus, 1748), neuter plural of hymenopter: see hymenopter.] A large and important order of the class Insecta. The order is characterized by the 4 membranous wings, of which the hind pair is almost always smaller than the front pair, and has comparatively few nervures. The mouth bears man-

Parts of the Head and of the Sting of the Bumblebee (Bombus), highly magnified.
A, section of head: a, ocellus; b, antenna; c, clypeus; d, labrum; e, mandible; f, epipharynx; g, maxilla; h, cardo; i, j, k, l, mentum and submentum; m, n, labial palpus; o, paraglossa; a, lingua, or median process of the ligula; n, occipital foramen. B, the sting: a, quadrate sclerite, connected with one of the lances of the sting; b, duct of the poison-gland; c, grooved median piece in which the lances play; d, one of the lateral setae palpiform sheath-plates; e, genital aperture.

dibles, and a lower lip or tongue sheathed by the maxillae. The tarsi are generally 5-jointed, sometimes 4-jointed, rarely 3-jointed, and very seldom heteromerous. The abdomen of the female is provided with a multivalve ovipositor, which may act as a sting, a saw, or a borer. The larvae are vermiform and footless, except in Phyllophaga and Xylophaga, in which they are caterpillar-like and have feet. The Hymenoptera are usually placed at the head of the class of insects, not only on account of their high structural development, but also with regard to their extraordinary instinctive faculties and social qualities. In modern systems the order is divided into 8 series and 36 families. The series are: (1) Phyllophaga, the saw-flies; (2) Xylophaga, the horntails; (3) Parasitica, with six families, the species of which are mainly parasitic; (4) Tubulifera, or cuckoo-bees; (5) Heterogyna, the four families of ants; (6) Fossorae, eleven families of sand- and wood-wasps; (7) Diploptera, with two families of solitary and one of social wasps; and (8) Anthophila, with the two families of bees. In number of species this order stands next to Coleoptera; it probably includes nearly one fourth of all insects. More than 1,000 genera are represented in Europe alone, and there are over 7,000 described European species. Between 5,000 and 6,000 species have been described for America north of Mexico, and yet the extensive group of Parasitica is little known, especially in its smaller forms. — Fossorial Hymenoptera. See fossorial.

hymenopter (hi-me-nop'te-ral), a. [< hymenopter-ous + -al.] Same as hymenopterous.

hymenopter (hi-me-nop'te-ran), n. [< Hymenoptera + -an.] Same as hymenopter.

hymenopterist (hi-me-nop'te-ris-t), n. [< Hymenoptera + -ist.] One who collects or studies the Hymenoptera.

hymenopterologist (hi-me-nop'te-ral'ō-jist), n. [< hymenopterology + -ist.] One who is versed in the study of Hymenoptera. Lubbock.

hymenopterology (hi-me-nop'te-ral'ō-jī), n. [< Hymenoptera + Gr. -λογία, < λέγω, speak: see -ology.] That department of entomology which relates to Hymenoptera.

hymenopteron (hi-me-nop'te-ron), n. [NL.: see hymenopterous.] One of the Hymenoptera.

hymenopterous (hi-me-nop'te-rus), a. [< NL. hymenopter, < Gr. ὑμενόπτερος, membrane-winged, < ὑμν, membrane, + πτερόν, wing.] Having membranous wings; specifically, having the characters of the Hymenoptera; pertaining to the Hymenoptera. Also hymenopteral.

Hymenothalameæ (hi'men-ō-tha-lā'mē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Lindley, 1846), < Gr. ὑμν, a membrane, + θάλαμος, a chamber.] A division of lichens, now referred to the tribe Lecideaceæ.

hymenotomy (hi-me-not'ō-mī), n. [< Gr. ὑμν, a membrane, + τομή, a cutting, < τέμνω, ταμείν, cut.] 1. In anat., dissection of the membranes of the animal body; hymenological anatomy. — 2. In surg., incision of the hymen, practised in certain cases of imperforation of the vagina, in order to give exit to blood retained and accumulated in the cavity of the uterus. Dunghison.

hymenulum (hi-men'ū-lum), n.; pl. hymenula (-lā). [NL., dim. of Gr. ὑμν (hymn-), a membrane: see hymen + hymenium.] In bot., a shield containing ascii. Cooke.

Hymettian (hi-met'i-an), a. [< L. Hymettius, < Hymettus, < Gr. Ὑμηττός, Hymettus: see def.] Of or pertaining to Hymettus, a mountain of Attica in Greece, celebrated for its flowers, honey, and marble; like that of Hymettus. The mountain is covered with heather, the blossoms of which give it, when seen from a distance, a rosy-purple coloring.

A lovely bee . . . absconding himself in Hymettian flowers. Lowell, Fireside Travels, p. 76.

Hymettian marble, a bluish-gray marble from the quarries of Mount Hymettus. It is an excellent building stone, and was much used in antiquity, as at the present day.

Hymettic (hi-met'ik), a. [< Hymettus + -ic.] Same as Hymettian.

The censor L. Crassus was much censured about the year 650 on account of his house with six small columns of Hymettic marble. C. O. Müller, Manual of Archæol. (trans.), § 188.

hymn (hī-m), n. [*< ME. hymne, himpe, usually hymne, impe, < AS. hymen, ymen, pl. ymnas, in ME. mixed with OF. ymne, later hymne = Fr. hymne, ymne = Sp. himno = Pg. himno = It. inno = D. G. Dan. hymne = Sw. hymn, < LL. hymnus (in eccl. use), < Gr. ὕμνος, a hymn, festive song, or ode in praise of gods or heroes. Origin uncertain; only once in Homer, in the phrase ὕμνος αἰώνιος, which may perhaps mean lit. 'a web of song'; cf. ὄψα, a web, ὄψα-αὐτὴν = AS. wefan, E. weave.] 1. In general, a religious ode, song, or other poem: as, the Homeric hymns; the hymns of Pindar. In Christian literature the term covers a wide range of poems, including those that embody not only adoration, thanksgiving, confession, and supplication to God, but also instruction and exhortation for men.*

Noghte anely he hase comforth in this, bot also in psalmes and ymnys and antymys of Haly Kyrie. Hamptole, Prose Treatises (E. E. T. S.), p. 18.

Ourself have often tried Valkyrian hymns, or into rhythm have dash'd The passion of the prophesies. Tennyson, Princess, iv.

Specifically — 2. A metrical formula of public worship, usually designed to be sung by a company of worshippers. The hymns of the ancient Hebrews are technically called psalms. From the early Christian period many traces of hymns remain, as in the Magnificat, Benedictus, etc. in the New Testament, in such references as 1 Cor. xiv. 15, Eph. v. 19, Jas. v. 13, etc., and in the universally recognized Gloria Patri, Gloria in Excelsis, and Te Deum. The long succession of important Greek and Latin hymnists begins with Ephraem Syrus and Hilary of Poitiers (both of the fourth century) respectively, though several productions of known authorship antedate their time. Most of the great medieval Latin hymns were composed as sequences, the most famous being the Dies Irae. The Roman Catholic Church possesses a large number of such hymns, mostly in Latin. The Reformation in Germany was distinguished by a remarkable outburst of hymns of every description. English hymnody began in the sixteenth century, but was principally confined to metrical versions of the Psalms until the first publication of Isaac Watts (in 1707) and the hymns of Charles and John Wesley. Since then the production of hymns has been constant and significant in both England and America. Medieval and modern hymns are nearly always divided into equal and similar sections of from three to twelve lines or strophes each, which are called stanzas or verses.

And when they had sung an hymn, they went out into the mount of Olives. Mat. xxvi. 30.

Admonishing one another in psalms and hymns and spiritual songs. Col. iii. 16.

3. In a narrow sense, an extra-Biblical poem of worship: opposed to psalm. Specially used in connection with the discussions about the propriety of using any musical formulae in public worship which are not directly derived from the Bible. — Abecedarian hymns. See abecedarian. — Angelic hymn, cherubic hymn, communion hymn, Mercellian hymn, etc. See the qualifying words. — Evening hymn. Same as even-song. 1. — Seven great hymns, a collective name for the following medieval Latin hymns: Dies Irae; Hora Novissima; Jesu, dulcis memoria; Stabat Mater; Veni, Creator Spiritus; Veni, Sancte Spiritus; and Vexilla Regis.

hymn (him), v.; pret. and pp. hymned (himd or him'ned), ppr. hymning (him'ing or him'ning). [< hymn, n. Cf. LL. hymnare, sing hymns; from the noun.] 1. trans. 1. To celebrate or worship in song; address hymns to; salute with song.

As sons of one great Sire, Hymning the Eternal Father. Milton, P. L., vi. 96.

The mulberry-tree stood centre of the dance; The mulberry-tree was hymn'd with dulcet airs. Cowper, Task, vi. 697.

There the wild wood-robin Hymns your solitude. R. T. Cooke, Trailing Arbutus.

2. To express in a hymn; sing as a hymn: as, "hymned thanks," J. Baillie. The perpetual poem hymned by wind and surge. Harper's Mag., LXXVI. 757.

II. intrans. To sing hymns.

And touch'd their golden harps, and hymning praised God and his works. Milton, P. L., vii. 258.

Around in festive songs the hymning choir Mix the melodious voice and sounding lyre. West, tr. of Pindar's Nemean Odes, xi.

hymnal (him'nal), a. and n. [< hymn + -al.] 1. a. Of or pertaining to hymns; of the nature of or suitable for a hymn.

The grave, majestic, hymnal measure swells like the peal of an organ. Stedman, Vict. Poets, p. 169.

II. n. A hymn-book.

hymnary (him'nār), n. [< ML. hymnare, a hymn-book, < LL. hymnus, a hymn: see hymn. Cf. hymnary.] A hymn-book.

That our Anglo-Saxon brethren were not slow in adopting these beautiful outpourings of the Christian poet we know from one of Zielf's enactments, requiring each clerk to have, along with other volumes, a hymnar.

Rock, Church of our Fathers, III. ii. 13.

hymnarium (him-nā'ri-um), n. [ML.: see hymnary.] A hymn-book.

But the reader will scarcely agree with his indulgent estimate of Ken's epic and hymnarium.

The Academy, Nov. 3, 1888, p. 281.

hymnary (him'nār-i), n.; pl. hymnaries (-riz). [< ML. hymnarius (sc. liber), also hymnarium, a hymn-book, < LL. hymnus, a hymn: see hymn.]

A hymn-book. [Rare.]

They [the vicars] were required to learn by heart, so as to need no book, their psalter, their Hymnary, and their Anthem-book. Contemporary Rev., LIII. 59.

hymn-book (him'būk), n. A book of hymns for use in public worship.

hymnic (him'nik), a. [< hymn + -ic.] Relating to hymns; of the character of a hymn; lyric.

Where she [faire ladies], tuning her chaste layes Of England's empress to her hymnlike string, For your affect, to hear that virgin's praise, Makes choice of your chaste self to heare her sing. Mir. for Mag., p. 773.

hymnisch, adv. [< hymn + -isch.] In the manner of a hymn.

Sonnets are carolled hymnisch By lads and maydens. Stanhurst, Æneid, ii. 248.

hymnist (him'nist), n. [< hymn + -ist.] A composer of hymns; one skilled in the writing of hymns; a hymnologist.

Our familiar hymnist, Watts. H. W. Beecher, N. Y. Christian Union, Dec. 20, 1876.

hymnodist (him'nō-dist), n. [< hymnody + -ist.] A hymnist.

hymnody (him'nō-dī), n. [< ML. hymnodia, < Gr. ὑμνοδία, the singing of a hymn, hymning, < ὑμνός, singing hymns, < ὕμνος, a hymn, + αἰδέω, αἰδύν, sing: see ode. Cf. psalmody.] 1. The act or art of singing hymns or sacred songs; psalmody. — 2. Hymns collectively; the body of hymns belonging to a particular period, country, sect, or author.

hymnographer (him-nog'ra-fēr), n. [< hymnography + -er.] A hymn-writer.

hymnography (him-nog'ra-fi), n. [*< Gr. as if ὑμνογραφία, < ὑμνογράφος, writing hymns, < ὕμνος, a hymn, + γράφειν, write.] The art or the act of writing hymns.

hymnologist (him-nol'ō-jist), n. [< hymnology + -ist.] 1. A student of hymnology; a connoisseur in the history, classification, criticism, and use of hymns. — 2. A hymn-writer.

hymnology (him-nol'ō-jī), n. [*< LL. as if hymnologia, < Gr. ὑμνολογία, < ὑμνόλογος, singing hymns (> LL. hymnologus, a singer of hymns), < ὕμνος, a hymn, + -λογία, < λέγειν, speak: see -ology.] 1. The science of hymns, treating of their history, classification, criticism, and use. — 2. Hymnody.

That hymnologic which the primitive Church used at the offering of bread and wine for the Eucharist. J. Mede, Dialogues, p. 56.

hymn-tune (him'tūn), n. A musical setting of a hymn, usually adapted for repetition with the successive verses or stanzas. Certain kinds of hymn-tunes are called chorals.

hymn-writer (him'ri'tēr), n. A writer or composer of hymns; a hymnist.

hymnet, n. An obsolete form of hymn.

hynd¹, n. An obsolete form of hind¹.

hynd², a. Same as hend².

hyngt, n. An obsolete preterit of hang. Chaucer.

hyobranchial (hi-ō-brang'ki-al), a. [< hyo(id) + branchial.] Pertaining to the hyoid bone and the branchiæ.

Hyodon (hi'ō-don), n. [NL., < Gr. ὤ, the letter upsilon, Y (in ref. to hyoid), + ὀδών (ōdōn-) = E. tooth.] The typical genus of Hyodontidae, having teeth on the hyoid bone, whence the name. H. alosoides is the common mooneye or toothed herring of the United States. Lesueur, 1818. See cut under mooneye.

hyodont (hi'ō-dont), a. and n. [< Hyodon(t-).] 1. a. Having teeth on the hyoid bone; specifically, of or pertaining to the Hyodontidae.

II. n. A fish of the family Hyodontidae.

Hyodontidae (hi-ō-dont'ī-tā), n. pl. [NL., < Hyodon(t-) + -idae.] A family of malacopterygian fishes, represented by the genus Hyodon;

the toothed herrings, or mooneyes. The body is covered with large silvery cycloid scales; the head is naked; the margin of the upper jaw is formed by the intermaxillaries mesially and by the maxillaries laterally, the latter being articulated to the ends of the former; the opercular apparatus is complete; the dorsal fin belongs to the caudal part of the vertebral column; the stomach is horseshoe-shaped, and without a blind sac; the intestine is short, with one pyloric appendage; and the ova fall into the abdominal cavity before exclusion. Three species are found in the Mississippi basin and the great lakes of North America; they have a distant resemblance to a clupeoid fish.

hyo-epiglottic (hi'ō-ep-i-glōt'ik), a. [< hyo(id) + epiglottic.] Pertaining to the hyoid bone and the epiglottis. — Hyo-epiglottic ligament, an elastic band connecting the hyoid bone with the epiglottis.

hyo-epiglottidean (hi'ō-ep'i-glo-tid'ē-an), a. Same as hyo-epiglottic.

hyoganoidei (hi-ō-gan'oid), a. and n. 1. a. Pertaining to the Hyoganoidei, or having their characters.

II. n. One of the Hyoganoidei.

hyoganoidean (hi'ō-ga-noi'dē-an), a. and n. Same as hyoganoidei.

Hyoganoidei (hi'ō-ga-noi'dē-i), n. pl. [NL., < hyo(id) + NL. Ganoidei, q. v.] A superorder of true fishes, including the most teleosteid of the ganoid fishes, having the hyoid apparatus and branchiostegal rays like those of the teleosts. It includes the orders Cyclopanoidei and Rhombognoidei, represented in the existing fauna only by the Amia and Lepidosteidae, but in ancient times having numerous and diversified representatives. Gill.

hyoglossal (hi-ō-glos'al), a. and n. [< hyo(id) + Gr. γλῶσσα, tongue, + -al.] I. a. Pertaining to the hyoid bone and the tongue.—Hyoglossal membrane, a fibrous sheet connecting the base of the tongue with the hyoid bone.—Hyoglossal muscle, the hyoglossus.

II. n. Same as hyoglossus.

hyoglossus (hi-ō-glos'us), n.; pl. hyoglossi (-i). [< hyo(id) + Gr. γλῶσσα, tongue.] A muscle of the hyoid bone and the tongue. In man the hyoglossus is a thin, flat, somewhat square muscle, arising from the whole length of the hyoid bone, on each side of its body, and inserted into the side of the tongue between the styloglossus and lingualis. The origin of the muscle from different parts of the hyoid bone, namely, from the body and the lesser and greater cornua, has caused the description of the muscle as three, called basihyoglossus, ceratoglossus, and chondroglossus. Also called basioeratochondroglossus.

hyoid (hi'oid), a. and n. [= F. hyoïde, < NL. hyoïdes, < Gr. ὑοειδής, shaped like the letter upsilon, Υ, now commonly printed Y; δοτεινὸν ὑοειδής, the hyoid bone (also called ὀψιλοειδής, upsilon-shaped, and λαμβδοειδής, lambda-shaped [A]: see upsilon, and lambda, lambdoid); < ὀ, the letter upsilon, + ειδής, form.] I. a. Having the form of the Greek letter upsilon, Υ. In biology and embryology it is applied to the bony or hard parts developed in the second postoral visceral arch of the embryo, this being called the hyoid or hyoidan arch or apparatus, as distinguished from preceding mandibular or succeeding branchial parts.—Hyoid bone. Same as hyoid, u.

II. n. The tongue-bone or os linguae; the hyoidan bone or collection of bones; so called from its shape in man. In man it is embedded in the muscles of the root of the tongue, lying nearly horizontal with its convexity forward, usually about on a level with the lower border of the under jaw, considerably above the Adam's apple; but it is displaced in every act of swallowing. This horseshoe-shaped arch forms the bony basis of the tongue. (See out under mouth.) No fewer than 10 muscles arise from or are inserted into it; and it is besides suspended from the skull by the hyoid ligament, and connected with the larynx by the thyrohyoid membrane and ligament, and with the epiglottis by the hyo-epiglottic ligament. Its comparatively small size and simple structure in man are unusual; in most animals the bone is either relatively larger, or consists of a number of separate bones, indications of which are found in the human species in the several ossific Diagrams of the mandibular (I, shaded) and hyoidan (II, unshaded) arches of a fish. (A), a malleus; (B), an osseous fish (C). I. Mck, Meckel's cartilage; Art, articulate; Qu, quadrate; M, malleus; SSp, supra-stapedial; S, stapes; Hy, hyoid bone; Mck, Meckel's cartilage; StH, stapedial hyaline. The arrow is in the first vertical cleft.

centers from which the bone originates. Thus, the body of the human hyoid is the basihyal; the lesser cornua or horns are the ceratohyals; and the greater cornua are the thyrohyals. (See out under skull.) In a saurapsidan, as a bird, the so-called hyoid bone is the whole skeleton of the tongue, consisting of several parts developed in a branchial arch, as well as hyoidan parts properly so called. These parts are the basihyal, glossohyal, and ceratohyal or epipharyngeal of the hyoidan arch proper; with the urohyal or basibranchial, the epibranchial, and the ceratobranchial, these three belonging to a branchial arch, and the last two of them being commonly known as the thyrohyal or greater cornua of the hyoid bone. The elements of the hyoid bone of an osseous fish are the basihyal, glossohyal, urohyal, epipharyngeal, ceratohyal, and stylohyal.

hyoidal (hi-oi-dē'al), a. [< hyoid + -e-al.] Same as hyoid.

This development [of the skull] relates to the protection and support of the still more extraordinarily developed hyoid and laryngeal apparatus [of the hovers].

Owen, Anat., II. 531.

hyoidan (hi-oi-dē'an), a. [< hyoid + -e-an.] Same as hyoid.

hyomandibular (hi-ō-man-dib'ū-lār), a. and n. [< hyo(id) + mandibular.] I. a. Pertaining to the hyoid bone and to the mandible or lower jaw.

The hyoidan arch becomes segmented into two noteworthy portions, the upper of which is known as the hyomandibular portion. Mivart, Encyc. Brit., XXII. 114.

Hyomandibular bone, in fishes, the bone or element of the suspensorium of the lower jaw next to articulating with the cranium. Also called epitympanic and temporal.

II. n. Same as hyomandibular bone.

hyomental (hi-ō-men'tal), a. [< hyo(id) + mental.] Pertaining to the hyoid bone and the chin.

hyoplastral (hi-ō-plas'tral), a. Of or pertaining to the hyoplastron.

hyoplastron (hi-ō-plas'tron), n. [< hyo(id) + plastron.] The second lateral piece of the plastron of a turtle: a name given by Huxley to what others call the hyosternum. See second cut under Chelonina.

Hyopotamidae (hi-ō-pō-tam'i-dē), n. pl. [< NL. < Hyopotamus + -idae.] A family of omnivorous ungulate mammals, represented by the genus Hyopotamus and related to the Suidae, or swine. Kowalevsky.

Hyopotaminae (hi-ō-pō-tam'i-nē), n. pl. [< NL. < Hyopotamus + -inae.] The Hyopotamidae regarded as a subfamily of Anthracotheriidae, having the four upper premolars resembling the true molars, and with tubercles in transverse series separated by transverse valleys, and the preceding three molars successively more and more differentiated. Besides Hyopotamus, the subfamily contains the genus Bothriodon (Aymard) or Ancodus (Pomel). T. Gill, 1872.

Hyopotamus (hi-ō-pōt'a-mus), n. [< NL. < Gr. ὕς, a pig, hog (= L. sus = E. sow) + ποταμός, river. Cf. hyppopotamus.] A genus of fossil non-ruminant artiodactyl mammals, supposed to have been of aquatic habits and related to swine, whence the name, given by Owen in 1848. The remains occur in the Tertiary strata, Eocene and Miocene, of England and the continent of Europe. The genus has been referred to the Suidae and to the Anthracotheriidae, and also made the type of a family Hyopotamidae.

hyoscapular (hi-ō-skap'ū-lār), a. [< hyo(id) + scapular, q. v.] Pertaining to the hyoid bone and to the scapula; omohyoid.

hyoscine (hi'ō-sin), n. [< Hyoscyamus + -ine.] A non-crystallizable alkaloid obtainable only as a syrup from Hyoscyamus niger. It is known in commerce as amorphous hyoscyamine, and its salts are used in medicine to some extent.

Hyoscyameae (hi'ō-si-ā'mō-ē), n. pl. [< NL. (Reichenbach, 1837), < Hyoscyamus + -eae.] A tribe of plants of the natural order Solanaceae, typified by the genus Hyoscyamus, having the lobes of the corolla plicate or imbricate, the stamens all perfect, and the fruit a capsule.

hyoscyamine (hi-ō-si-ā-min), n. [< Hyoscyamus + -ine. Cf. L. hyoscyaminus, < Gr. ὕσκιανμος, of henbane.] A crystalline alkaloid (C₁₇H₂₃NO₃) obtained from Hyoscyamus niger, or henbane. When moist it has a strong alkaline reaction, and a penetrating, narcotic, and stupefying odor like that of nicotine. It neutralizes acids, forming salts, some of which, particularly the sulphate, are used in medicine. The alkaloid is extremely poisonous.—Amorphous hyoscyamine. Same as hyoscine.

Hyoscyamus (hi-ō-si-ā-mus), n. [< Gr. ὕσκιανμος, henbane, lit. hog's bean, < ὕς, gen. of ὕς, a hog, + ίκτιανος, a bean.] A genus of dicotyledonous gamopetalous plants, of the natural order Solanaceae, type of the tribe Hyoscyameae. They have a tubular-campanulate calyx, an infundibuliform corolla with an oblique limb and imbricated unequal lobes, and a capsule opening by a median transverse cleft, the top falling off like a lid. They are herbs with the leaves sinuate dentate or incised, and yellowish flowers in usually 1-sided leafy spikes. About 10 species are known, natives of the Mediterranean region and central Asia. H. niger is the henbane or black henbane. See out under henbane.

Hyoserideae (hi-ō-se-rid'ē-ē), n. pl. [< NL. < Hyoseris (-id-) + -eae.] A subtribe of composite plants, typified by the genus Hyoseris. They are herbs, having the pappus more or less chaffy, small, with alternate bristles, and the apex of the achenia truncate.

Hyoseris (hi-os'e-ris), n. [< NL. < Gr. ὕς, a hog, + ὄρεα, sucrose.] A small genus of composite plants, of the tribe Chichoriaceae, the type of the subtribe Hyoserideae, having the habit and foliage of Taraxacum. The flower-scape is thickened upward and bears a single yellow flower-head. From their near allies they differ in that the achenia are of two kinds in each head, the outer corky and cylindrical, the inner compressed or two-winged. The pappus is biserial, and consists of narrow and unequal scales. Four species are known from the Mediterranean region, one extending into southern Germany. H. minima is the hog-sucrose. Two fossil species very closely related to this genus have been described, from the Miocene of Carniola and Bohemia, under the name Hyoserites.

hyosternal (hi-ō-stēr'nal), a. [< hyo(id) + sternal.] 1. Pertaining to the hyoid bone and the breast-bone; sternohyoid.—2. In herpet., of or pertaining to the hyoplastron: as, a hyosternal scute.

hyosternum (hi-ō-stēr'nūm), n. [< hyo(id) + sternum.] The second lateral piece of the so-called sternum—that is, of the plastron—of a chelonian; the hyoplastron of Huxley. See second cut under Chelonina.

hyostylic (hi-ō-sti'lik), a. [< hyo(id) + Gr. στυλός, pillar, style.] Having the lower jaw suspended from the skull by a special suspensorium: the opposite of autostylic.

Most modern researchers have also tended to emphasize the distinction between fishes with autostylic and those with hyostylic skulls.

hyp., n. and v. See hip.⁴

hyp-. See hypo-.

hypacusis (hip-a-kū'sis), n. [< NL. < Gr. ὑπό, under, + ακουά, hearing, < ἀκούω, hear: see acoustics.] In pathol., diminished power of hearing.

hypæsthesia (hip-es-thē'si-ā), n. [< NL. < Gr. ὑπό, under, + αἰσθησις, perception: see esthetic, etc.] In pathol., diminished capacity for sensation; a dulled but not obliterated sensitiveness.

hypæsthesic (hip-es-thē'sik), a. [< hypæsthesia + -ic.] Pertaining to or characterized by hypæsthesia.

hypæthra, n. Plural of hypæthron.

hypæthral, a. See hypæthral.

When processions of men and maidens bearing urns and laurel-branches, crowned with ivy or with myrtle, paced along those sandstone roads, chanting psalms and prosodial hymns, toward the glistening porches and hypæthral cells. J. A. Symonds, Italy and Greece, p. 191.

hypæthron (hi-pē'thrōn), n.; pl. hypæthra (-thra). [< LL. hypæthrum, < Gr. ὑπαθρον, the uncovered part of a temple, < ὑπό, under, + αἶθρ, the sky: see ether.¹] In arch., an open court or inclosure; a place or part of a building that is hypæthral, or roofless. See hypæthral.

The light seems to have been introduced into what may be considered a court, or hypæthron, in front of the cell, which was lighted through its inner wall.

J. Ferguson, Hist. Arch., I. 265.

hypalgæsia (hip-al-jē'si-ā), n. [< NL. < Gr. ὑπό, under, + ἀλγῆσις, sense of pain, < ἀλγέω, be in pain, < ἄλγος, pain.] In pathol., diminished susceptibility to painful impressions; incipient analgesia.

hypalgia (hi-pal'ji-ā), n. [< NL. < Gr. ὑπό, under, + ἄλγος, pain.] Same as hypalgæsia.

hypallage (hi-pal'ā-jē), n. [< LL. < Gr. ὑπαλλαγή, an interchange, exchange, a figure of speech by which the parts of a proposition seem to be interchanged (metonymy, epidiorthosis, enallage, hypallage), < ὑπαλλάσσειν, exchange, < ὑπό, under, + ἀλλάσσειν, change, < ἀλλάγῃ, change, exchange: see allagite. Cf. enallage.] In gram. and rhet., a figure which consists in inversion of syntactical relation between two words, each assuming the construction which in accordance with ordinary usage would have been assigned to the other. Thus, in Virgil (Æneid, iii. 61), "dare classibus auro" (to give the winds to the fleets) is substituted for the usual construction "dare classes auro" (to give the fleets to the winds); the dative and accusative—that is, the indirect and direct objects—having been interchanged. Hypallage is a bold departure from the custom; any mode of expression, and is almost entirely confined to poetry.—Hypallage of the adjective, the transfer of the attribute from that one of two interdependent substantives with which it would usually agree to the other, especially from a substantive in the genitive to that governing it. See enallage.

hypanisognathism (hi-pan-i-sog'nā-thizm), n. [< As hypanisognathous + -ism.] In zool., that inequality of the teeth of opposite jaws in which the lower are narrower than the upper; one of two types of anisognathism, the other being epianisognathism. Cope.

hypanisognathous (hi-pan-i-sog'nā-thus), a. [< Gr. ὑπό, under, + ἄνωστος, unequal, uneven, + γνάθος, the jaw.] In zool., having the lower teeth narrower than the upper. Cope.

Hypante (hi-pan'tē), n. See Hypapante.

hypanthia, n. Plural of hypanthium.

hypanthial (hi-pan'thi-al), a. [< hypanthium + -al.] Of, pertaining to, or resembling a hypanthium: as, a hypanthial receptacle.

hypanthium (hi-pan'thi-um), n.; pl. hypanthia (-i). [< NL. < Gr. ὑπό, under, + ἄνθος, a flower.] In bot., an enlargement or other development of the torus under the calyx. Gray. This term has been widely, but incorrectly, applied to the fruit of the fig and allied forms, which properly come under syconium or hypanthodium.

hypanthodium (hi-pan-thō'di-um), n. [< NL. < Gr. ὑπό, under, + NL. anthodium, q. v.] In bot., same as syconium.

hypantrum (hi-pan'trum), n.; pl. hypantra (-trā). [< NL. < Gr. ὑπαντρος, cavernous, with caverns underneath, < ὑπό, under, + ἄντρον, a cavern: see antre.] In anat., the recess in the neural arch of a vertebra with which the hyposphene articulates. See hyposphene, and compare zygantrum.

Hypapante (hip-a-pan'tē), n. [< LGr. ὑπαπαντή, a later form of ὑπαντή, equiv. to Gr. ὑπαντή, a coming to meet, < ὑπαντήν, go to meet, < ὑπό, under, + ἀντήν, come opposite to, < ἀντα, over against, face to face: see ante-, anti-.] In the Gr. Ch., a festival in memory of the meeting of the infant Christ and his mother with Simeon and Anna in the temple: same as the Western Purification or Candlemas. Also Hypante.

hypapophyses, n. Plural of hypapophysis.
hypapophysis (hip-ă-pŏ-fiz'-i-ăl), a. [hypapophysis + -al.] Of or pertaining to a hypapophysis: as, the hypapophyseal arch.
hypapophysis (hip-ă-pŏ-fiz'-i-sis), n.; pl. hypapophyses (-sez). [NL., < Gr. ὑπό, under, + ἀπόφυσις, a sprout or process: see apophysis.] In anat., a median process or apophysis from the under or ventral side of the centrum of a vertebra: opposed to epapophysis. The anterior portion of the ring of the human atlas is regarded as a hypapophysis.

Lumbar Vertebra of Hare.

h, hypapophysis; s, very long transverse process; s, spinous process; az, metapophysis; az, prezygapophysis.

by those who hold that its body ankyloses with the axis as the odontoid process of the latter.

hypargyrite (hip-ăr'-tî-rit), n. [Gr. ὑπό, under, + ἀργυρος, silver, + -ite.] A massive variety of miargyrite obtained from Clausthal in the Harz.

hyparterial (hip-ăr-tê'-ri-ăl), a. [Gr. ὑπό, under, + ἀρτηρία, artery.] Lying below the artery, as a bronchial tube.

hypaspist (hi-pas'-pist), n. [Gr. ὑπασπιστής, a shield-bearer, armor-bearer, < ὑπασπίς, serve as shield-bearer, < ὑπό, under, + ἀσπίς, shield.] In Gr. antiq., a shield-bearer or an armor-bearer; an esquire; in the Macedonian army, one of a royal guard of light-armed foot-soldiers, so called from their shields.

hypate (hip-ă-tê), n. [L. hypate, < Gr. ὑπάρη (sc. χορδή), the highest note as regards length of string, but the lowest note as regards pitch, fem. of ὑπατος, highest, lowest, extreme, superl. equiv. to ὑπεράτος, superl. of ὑπέρ, over: see hyper-.] In anc. music, the first or lowest tone in the lowest and in the next to the lowest tetrachords of the recognized system of tones, corresponding loosely to the modern B and E.

hypaton (hip-ă-ton), n. [Gr. ὑπάτων, neut. of ὑπάτος, highest: see hypate.] See tetrachord.

hypaxial (hi-pak'-si-ăl), a. [Gr. ὑπό, under, + L. axis.] In anat., beneath the vertebral axis of the body; situated on the ventral side of or below the bodies of the vertebrae: opposed to epaxial.—Hypaxial muscles, those muscles lying beneath the spinal column, on the ventral aspect of the vertebral centra.

hypemia, n. An erroneous form of hyphemia.
Hypena (hi-pē'-nă), n. [NL. (Schränk, 1802), < Gr. ὑπην, the hair on the upper lip, mustache, appar. < ὑπό, under, + -ην, perhaps = Skt. ana, the part under the nose.] A genus of pyralid moths, characterized by the small, rather prominent head, naked globose eyes, simple antennae, very long laterally compressed palpi, a projecting scaly tuft on the front, and unarmed legs. It is a large and wide-spread genus, with over 100 species, largely Asiatic and South American. H. proboscidealis is known as the snout-moth, from the prominent palpi. H. humilis is a hop-feeder in the United States. H. scabratis is a common North American species whose larva feeds on grass and clover.

Hypenidæ (hi-pen'-i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Hypena + -idæ.] A family of moths, typified by the genus Hypena, of the group Pyralidina. They have broad wings, the anterior ones often bearing tufts of elevated scales, the anterior legs not tufted, palpi long and ascending, and antennae in the male generally ciliate or pubescent. It is an extensive group, of about 16 genera.

hyper (hi-pēr), n. [Abbr. of hypercritic.] A hypercritic. [Humorous and rare.]

Criticks I read on other Men,
And hyper upon them again.
Prior, Ep. to F. Shepherd, May 14, 1689.

hyper (hi-pēr), v. i. [Origin obscure.] To move about actively; bustle. [Local, U. S.]

Hyper: to bustle. "I must hyper about an' git tea."
Lowell, Biglow Papers, 2d ser., Int.

hyper-. [= F. hyper- = Sp. hiper- = Pg. hyper- = It. iper-, < L. hyper-, < Gr. ὑπέρ, prep., over, above, beyond, across, for, in behalf of, instead of, about, concerning; prefix hyper-, over, above (in all relations); = L. super, above, = AS. ofer, E. over: see super, over, over-.] A prefix of Greek origin, meaning 'over,' and usually implying transcendence or excess. It is freely used as an English formative, often with only secondary reference to the Greek. Specifically—(a) In chem., the same as super-, indicating the highest of a series of compounds: thus, hyperchloric acid signifies the highest of the series of chloric acids, containing more oxygen than chloric acid. The prefix per- is now generally used for hyper-, as perchloric, permanganic, etc. (b) In ancient and medieval music: (1) Of intervals, measured upward; ascending: as, hyperdiapente. (2) Of modes or scales, beginning at a higher point, usually a perfect fourth above: opposed to hypo-. See hypo-. (c) In names of ecclesiastical modes, a mere mark of distinction from those with the prefix hypo-: thus, hyperdorian and Dorian denoted the same mode.

hyperabelian (hi-pēr-ă-bel'-i-an), a. [hyper- + Abelian.] In math., similar to an Abelian integral, function, or group, but more complicated.—Hyperabelian function, a function of two variables connected with a discontinuous group of substitutions of one of the following forms:

$$\begin{pmatrix} x & y \\ \frac{ax+b}{cx+d} & \frac{a'y+b'}{c'y+d'} \end{pmatrix} \quad \begin{pmatrix} x & y \\ \frac{a'x+b'}{c'x+d'} & \frac{ax+b}{cx+d} \end{pmatrix}$$ hyperacanthosis (hi-pēr-ăk-an-thō'-sis), n. [Gr. ὑπέρ, over, + ἀκανθα, spine, + -osis.] Hypertrophy of the stratum spinosum of the epidermis.

hyperacidity (hi-pēr-ă-sid'-i-ti), n. [Gr. ὑπέρ, over, + E. acidity, q. v.] Excessive acidity.

hyperactivity (hi-pēr-ăktiv'-i-ti), n. [Gr. ὑπέρ, over, + E. activity, q. v.] Over-activity; excessive energy.

Organs which are in a state of hyperactivity easily become diseased. Medical News, LII. 608.

hyperacuity (hi-pēr-ă-kū'-i-ti), n. [Gr. ὑπέρ, over, + E. acuity, q. v.] Morbid acuteness.

A case of alleged hypnotic hyperacuity of vision. Mind, XII. 164.

hyperacusis (hi-pēr-ă-kū'-sis), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑπέρ, over, + ἀκουσις, hearing, < ἀκούω, hear: see acoustic.] In pathol., excessive acuteness of the sense of hearing.

hyperacuteness (hi-pēr-ă-kūt'-nes), n. [Gr. ὑπέρ, over, + E. acuteness, q. v.] Excessive acuteness.

Subtlety and hyperacuteness were the bane of Scholasticism, and, by disgusting all serious minds, greatly contributed towards its overthrow. F. Winterton, Mind, XIII. 389.

hyperadenosis (hi-pēr-ăd-e-nō'-sis), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑπέρ, over, + ἀδην (ἀδέν), a gland, + -osis.] In pathol., the enlargement of lymphatic glands, as in Hodgkin's disease.

hyperæmia, hyperæmic. See hyperemia, etc.
hyperæolian, hyperæolic (hi-pēr-ă-ō'-i-ăn, -ol'-ik). See under mode.

hyperæsthesia (hi-pēr-ă-es-thē'-si-ăl), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑπέρ, over, + αἰσθησις, the faculty of sensation: see æsthesia.] In pathol., excessive sensibility; exalted sensation. Also hyperæsthesia, hyperæsthesis, hyperæsthesia.

To such a degree has this hyperæsthesia been observed that patients have been known to scream violently when the skin has been only touched.

F. B. Winslow, Obscure Diseases of the Brain and Mind, xx.

hyperæsthetic, a. See hyperæsthetic.

hyperalgæsia (hi-pēr-ă-jē'-si-ăl), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑπέρ, over, + ἄλγος, sense of pain, < ἄλγειν, feel pain.] In pathol., an abnormally great sensitiveness to pain.

hyperalgesic (hi-pēr-ăl-jē'-sik), a. [hyperalgæsia + -ic.] Pertaining to or exhibiting hyperalgæsia.

hyperalgia (hi-pēr-ăl'-ji-ăl), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑπέρ, over, + ἄλγος, pain.] Hyperalgæsia.

hyperaphic (hi-pēr-ăf'-ik), a. [Gr. ὑπέρ, over, + ἄφῃ, touch, < ἄπτειν, touch.] In pathol., having excessive sensitiveness to touch. Thomas, Med. Dict.

hyperapophyses, n. Plural of hyperapophysis.
hyperapophysial (hi-pēr-ă-pŏ-fiz'-i-ăl), a. [hyperapophysis + -al.] In anat., pertaining to or having the character of a hyperapophysis.

hyperapophysis (hi-pēr-ă-pŏ-fiz'-i-sis), n.; pl. hyperapophyses (-sez). [NL., < Gr. ὑπέρ, over, + ἀπόφυσις, a process: see apophysis.] A backwardly projecting process of the neural spine of a vertebra.

It is possible, however, for a neural spine to send back a pair of processes (hyperapophyses), as in Galago, etc., embracing the neural spine next below.

Mivart, Elem. Anat., p. 45.

hyperaspist (hi-pēr-ăs'-pist), n. [Gr. ὑπερασπιστής, one who holds a shield over, a protector, < ὑπερασπίειν, cover with a shield, < ὑπέρ, over, + ἀσπίς, a shield. Cf. hypaspist.] In Gr. antiq., one who protected another engaged in fighting by holding a shield over him; hence, a protector or defender.

I appeal to any indifferent reader, whether C. M. be not by his hyperaspist forsaken in the plain field.

Chillingworth, Works (ed. 1704), p. 26.

Such an opinion, if it should meet with peevish opposites on the one side, and confident hyperaspists on the other, might possibly make a sect.

Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), II. 326.

hyperbata, n. Plural of hyperbaton.

hyperbatic (hi-pēr-bat'-ik), a. [Gr. ὑπερβατικός, delighting in hyperbata, < ὑπερβατον, hyperbaton: see hyperbaton.] Pertaining to or of the nature of the figure hyperbaton; transposed; inverted.

hyperbatically (hi-pēr-bat'-i-kal'-i), adv. By the figure hyperbaton; by transposition or inversion.

hyperbaton (hi-pēr-bā-ton), n.; pl. hyperbata (-tā). [L., < Gr. ὑπερβατός, transposed, verbal adj. of ὑπερβαίνειν, step over, < ὑπέρ, over, + βαίνειν, go.] In gram. and rhet.: (a) A figure consisting in departure from the customary order by placing a word or phrase in an unusual position in a sentence; transposition or inversion, especially of a bold or violent sort. Hyperbaton is properly used for emphasis: as, "Great is Diana of the Ephesians" (Acts ix. 35), for "Diana of the Ephesians is great." It also frequently serves to facilitate clearness of connection between clauses. In ancient Greek and Latin literature it was in constant use to produce a rhythmical effect in sentences by arranging words on metrical rather than syntactical principles. It is most frequently used in poetry, being one of the principal means of differentiating poetic diction from that of prose; but it is by no means rare in oratory in passages of an especially earnest or passionate character, and it is very common in excited or vehement conversation. Also called trajection. See synchysis. (b) An instance or example of such transposition.

hyperbola (hi-pēr'-bŏ-lă), n. [= F. hyperbole = Sp. hipérbola = Pg. hyperbole = It. iperbola, < NL. hyperbola, < Gr. ὑπερβολή, the conic section hyperbola (so called by Apollonius because the side of the rectangle on the abscissa equal to the square of the ordinate overlaps the latus rectum) (see ellipse), lit. excess (see hyperbole), < ὑπερβάλλειν, throw over, exceed, < ὑπέρ, over, + βάλλειν, throw.] 1. A curve formed by the intersection of a plane with a double cone—that is, with two similar cones placed vertex to vertex, so that one is the continuation of the other. If the plane cuts only one of the cones, the section is a circle, an ellipse, or a parabola; but if both cones are cut, the section is a hyperbola. A hyperbola may be formed by throwing upon a table the shadow of a ball the top of which is higher than the source of light. It has two asymptotes. If through any point of the curve lines be drawn parallel to the asymptotes, the parallelogram so formed will be of constant area for any given hyperbola. The point of intersection of the asymptotes is the center of the hyperbola, and is equidistant from the two intersections of any line through it with the hyperbola. The two lines through the center bisecting the angles of the asymptotes are the lines of the axes of the hyperbola, and the curve is symmetrical with respect to these. One of these lines cuts the curve, and the points of intersection are called the vertices of the hyperbola. The line between the vertices is the major or transverse axis of the hyperbola. If from the vertices lines be drawn parallel to the two asymptotes, the two points at which these lines will meet will be the extremities of the minor or conjugate axis. Although the axes bear these names, the minor may be longer than the major axis. The equation of the hyperbola, referred to its center and axes, is Hyperbola.

DDE, GAF, are opposite branches of a hyperbola; F, F', foci; C, center; A, transverse axis; ab, conjugate axis; NCP, a diameter.

$\frac{x^2}{a^2} - \frac{y^2}{b^2} = 1$.

The foci of the hyperbola are two points on the line of the transverse axis distant from the center as far as the vertices are from the extremities of the conjugate axis. If from any point of the curve lines be drawn to the two foci, the difference of the lengths of these lines is constant for any given hyperbola, and the angle between them is bisected by the tangent at that point. The eccentricity of the hyperbola is the secant of half the angle between the asymptotes. The parameter or latus rectum of a hyperbola is a chord through the focus perpendicular to the transverse axis.

2. An algebraic curve having asymptotes greater in number by one than its order. This meaning was introduced by Newton.—Acute hyperbola, a hyperbola which lies in the acute angle between its asymptotes. Ambigena, ambiguent, etc., hyperbolic. See the adjectives. Circumscribed hyperbola, a hyperbola that crosses both asymptotes.—Common or cising. [hyper- + criticize, criticise.] To criticize with excessive severity; criticize capriciously.

hypercycle (hî'pér-si-kl), n. [Gr. ὑπέρ, over, + κύκλος, circle.] A plane curve of the sixth order and fourth class having the line at infinity as a double tangent, which possesses the property that two pairs of tangents to it may be so taken that, whatever fifth tangent be considered, the two circles inscribed or escribed in the two triangles formed each with one of the pairs of fixed tangents and the variable tangent have their points of contact with the latter at a constant distance. It is necessary that these circles and tangents be described in definite directions, in order to choose properly between the inscribed and escribed circles.

hyperdeterminant (hî'pér-dē-tér'mi-nant), a. and n. [hyper- + determinant.] I. a. In math., invariant.

II. n. In math., an invariant. This word, originally used by Cayley from 1845 to 1852, is now replaced by invariant.

hyperdiapason (hî'pér-di-ā-pā'zōn), n. [Gr. ὑπέρ, over, + διαπασών, diapason: see diapason.] In anc. music, the interval of the octave when measured upward; a superoctave.

hyperdiapente (hî'pér-di-ā-pen'tē), n. [Gr. ὑπέρ, over, + διάπεντε, diapente: see diapente.] In anc. music, the interval of a perfect fifth when measured upward.

hyperdiatessaron (hî'pér-di-ā-tess'a-ron), n. [Gr. ὑπέρ, over, + διατεσσαρόν, diatessaron: see diatessaron.] In anc. music, the interval of a perfect fourth when measured upward.

hyperdiazexis (hî'pér-di-ā-zūk'sis), n. [Gr. ὑπέρ, over, + διάζευξις, diazexis: see diazexis.] In anc. music, the separation of two tetrachords by the interval of an octave, as between the hypaton and the hyperbolæon. See tetrachord.

hyperdistributive (hî'pér-dis-trib'ū-tiv), a. and n. [hyper- + distributive.] I. a. Having the distributive property as extended to several variables simultaneously. Thus, if the function, operation, or symbol, F, is said to be hyperdistributive.

$$F(x, y) + F(x, z) = F(x, y + z),$$

II. n. A hyperdistributive function.

hyperditonos (hî'pér-dit'ō-nos), n. [Gr. ὑπέρ, over, + δίτονον, the major third: see ditone.] In anc. music, the interval of a major third when measured upward.

hyperdorian (hî'pér-dō'ri-an), a. [hyper- + Dorian.] See under mode.

hyperdoric (hî'pér-dor'ik), a. [hyper- + Doric.] See under mode.

hyperdulia (hî'pér-dū'li-ā), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑπέρ, beyond, + δούλια, service: see dulia.] The worship offered by Roman Catholics to the Virgin Mary: so called because it is higher than that given to other saints, which is known as dulia, while the worship due to God alone is called latria. See dulia. Also hyperduly.

hyperdual (hî'pér-dū'li-kāl), a. [hyperdulia + -ic.] Of the nature of hyperdulia.

hyperduly (hî'pér-dū'li), n. [F. hyperdulia, < NL. hyperdulia, q. v.] Same as hyperdulia.

hyperdynamic (hî'pér-di-nam'ik), a. [Gr. ὑπερδυνατός, of higher power, < ὑπέρ, over, + δύναμις, power: see dynamic.] In pathol., characterized by excessive violence or excitement, as the vital powers in some kinds or states of disease.

hyperelliptic (hî'pér-e-lip'tik), a. [hyper- + elliptic, q. v.] Transcending what is elliptic.—Hyperelliptic curve, a curve whose Cartesian coordinates are expressible rationally by a parameter, a, and the square root of an entire function, $Q(a)$, of degree $2p+2$, where p is the class of the curve.—Hyperelliptic function, a function arising from the conversion of hyperelliptic integrals in the same manner in which elliptic functions arise from the conversion of elliptic integrals.—Hyperelliptic integral, the integral of the square root of an integral function higher than the fourth degree.

hyperemesis (hî'pér-em'e-sis), n. [Gr. ὑπέρ, over, + ἐμεσις, vomiting: see emesis.] In pathol., excessive vomiting.

hyperemetic (hî'pér-em'e-tik), a. [hyperemesis, after emetic, q. v.] Pertaining to or affected with hyperemesis.

hyperemia, hyperamia (hî'pér-ē'mi-ā), n. [NL. hyperemia, < Gr. as if ὑπεραμία* (cf. ὑπεραμύω, have overmuch blood, < ὑπέρ, over, + αἷμα, blood.] In pathol., an excessive accumulation of blood in any part of the body.—Active or arterial hyperemia, excess of blood due to dilatation of the arterioles, the velocity of the current being increased.

—Passive or venous hyperemia, excess of blood due to obstruction of the outflow through the veins, the velocity of the current being diminished.

hyperemic, hyperamie (hî'pér-ē'mik), a. [hyperemia, hyperamia, + -ic.] In pathol., affected with hyperemia.

hyperesthesia, n. See hyperæsthesia.

hyperesthetic (hî'pér-es-thē'sik), a. [hyperesthesia + -ic.] Same as hyperæsthetic.

Hyperæsthetic states. — Amer. Jour. Psychol., I. 339.

hyperesthesia (hî'pér-es-thē'sis), n. Same as hyperæsthesia.

hyperæsthetic, hyperæsthetic (hî'pér-es-thet'ik), a. [hyperæsthesia, after æsthetic, q. v.] Morbidly sensitive; affected with hyperæsthesia. Also hyperesthesia.

The disorder [neuralgia dysmenorrhea] . . . is generally associated with a highly susceptible nervous temperament, which may be defined as the hyperæsthetic temperament. R. Barnes, Dis. of Women, p. 195.

A sleepy, phlegmatic creature will get up from bed in half the time it takes your hyperæsthetic patient to find himself among all the confusion of worries he has drawn around him, and to shake himself free from them. Harper's Mag., LXXVII. 223.

hyperfuchsian (hî'pér-fök'si-an), a. [hyper- + Fuchsian.] In math., resulting from an extension of the properties of the Fuchsian group or function.—Hyperfuchsian function, a function of two variables with a four-dimensional fundamental sphere as its natural limit and connected with the discontinuous group of substitutions hypergenesis (hî'pér-jen'ē-sis), n. [Gr. ὑπέρ, over, + γένεσις, generation.] Excessive production.

$$\begin{pmatrix} x, y \\ Ax + By + C \\ Ax + By + C' \end{pmatrix}$$

Hyperfuchsian group. See group.

hypergenetic (hî'pér-jē-net'ik), a. [hypergenesis, after genetic.] Pertaining to or characterized by hypergenesis.

hypergeometric (hî'pér-jē-ō-met'rik), a. [hyper- + geometric.] Resulting from an extension of the properties of the geometric series.—Hypergeometric function, the function expressed by a hypergeometric series, or by the equation

$$\phi x - dxy/dx + \frac{n-1}{0k}(-1)^{n-k} \left\{ (\lambda-k-1)n-k \phi n-kx + (\lambda-k-1)n-k-1 \psi n-k-1x \right\} dxy/dx^2 = 0,$$

where ϕx and ψx are integral functions of the *n*th and (n—1)th degrees respectively, and A is a constant.—Hypergeometric series. Same as Gaussian series (which see, under Gaussian).

hypergusia (hî'pér-gū'si-ā), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑπέρ, over, + γούσις, the sense of taste, < γεύω, taste.] Hyperæsthesia of the sense of taste.

hyperhexapod (hî'pér-hek'sā-pod), a. and n. [Gr. ὑπέρ, over, + ἑξαπόδιον, six-footed.] I. a. Having more than six legs, as an arthropod; pertaining to the Hyperhexapoda, or having their characters.

II. n. One of the Hyperhexapoda.

Hyperhexapoda (hî'pér-hek-sāp'ō-dā), n. pl. [NL.: see hyperhexapod.] Arthropods with more than three pairs of legs; the crustaceans, arachnids, and myriapods.

hyperhidrosis, hyperidrosis (hî'pér-hî-drō'sis, i-drō'sis), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑπέρ, over, + ἰδρωσις, perspiration: see hidrosis.] In pathol., excessive sweating.

Hyperia (hî'pér-i-ā), n. [NL.] The typical genus of the family Hyperidae.

Hypericeæ (hî'pér-is'ē-ā), n. pl. [NL., < Hypericum + -eæ.] A tribe of plants of the natural order Hypericaceæ, containing the genera Hypericum and Ascyrum. They are characterized by having the capsule septicidal, seeds not winged, and smooth petals.

Hypericandole (hî'pér-i-sin'ē-ō), n. pl. [NL. (A. P. de Candolle, 1824), < Hypericum + -in + -eæ.] A natural order of plants, of which the genus Hypericum is the type. It contains 8 genera and 210 species. They are herbs, shrubs, or (rarely) trees, with simple, opposite (rarely whorled) leaves, which are often dotted with resinous glands. They have terminal or axillary, solitary, cymose or paniculate flowers, usually yellow or white, with 5 sepals and usually 5 petals, and the numerous stamens usually united into 3 or 5 bundles at their base. Also called Hypericaceæ, Hypericaceæ, Hypericaceæ.

Hypericum (hî'pér-i-kum, usually hî'pér-i-kum), n. [L., also hypericon, < Gr. ὑπερικον (also ὑπερικόν), neut., ὑπερικόν, fem., St. John's-wort, < ὑπέρ, under, + ἔρκεν, also ἐρκεν, L. erice, heath, heather: see Erica.] 1. A large genus of plants, the type of the natural order Hypericaceæ, containing about 160 species, very generally distributed over the earth, characterized by having pentamerous flowers with the stamens commonly clustered into 3 to 5 parcels.

They are herbs or shrubs with cymose yellow flowers. H. perforatum, St. John's-wort, is a small species, which derives its specific name from the fact that the pellucid dots common to the leaves of most of the species are in it peculiarly conspicuous, so as to give the leaf the appearance of being perforated. It is a native of Europe, now extensively naturalized in the United States. H. Ascyron, the great St. John's-wort of the eastern United States, is a tall shrubby plant with pods an inch or more long. H. Kalmianum, Kalm's St. John's-wort, is a bushy shrub 1 to 6 feet high, growing along the northern lakes. H. nudicaule is the orange-grass or pineweed, common in sandy fields. H. muticum, the dwarf St. John's-wort, only 3 to 9 inches high, is common in low grounds everywhere in the eastern United States. H. Androsæmum, the tutsan or tutsan hypericum, is a somewhat woody species of southern Europe and central Asia. From its succulent capsule, which turns red and then black, it is placed by some in a separate genus. It was once considered a panacea. H. quadrangulum of Europe is the St. Peter's-wort or hard-hay. H. aureum is a handsome species of the southern United States.

Branch of Hypericum aureum, with flower and young fruit. a, cluster of stamens; b, fruit.

2. [L. c.] A plant of this genus. Hypericum all bloom, so thick a swarm of flowers, like flies clothing her slender rods, That scarce a leaf appears. Cowper, Task, vi. 165.

hyperideation (hî'pér-i-dē-ā'shōn), n. [hyper- + ideation.] Excessive mental activity; restlessness of mind.

hyperidrosis, n. See hyperhidrosis. Hyperiidae (hî'pér-i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Hyperia + -idae.] A family of amphipod crustaceans, typified by the genus Hyperia. They have a large subglobular head, large lateral eyes, straight antennae, palps to mandibles, the last five pairs of pereopods ambulatorial, and the seventh pair not transformed. Representatives occur in almost all seas. Also Hyperina.

Hyperiidea (hî'pér-i-dē-ē-ā), n. pl. [NL., < Hyperia + -idea.] A tribe or superfamily of amphipod crustaceans, having a free head, large lateral eyes, maxillipeds coalesced into a kind of operculum, uropods natatorial, and telson undivided. It contains 16 families, of which the most important is the Hyperidae.

hyperinosis (hî'pér-i-nō'sis), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑπέρ, over, + ἰς (is), strength, fiber, + -osis.] In pathol., a condition of the blood in which it forms on clotting an unusual amount of fibrin: opposed to hypinosis.

hyperinotic (hî'pér-i-not'ik), a. [NL. hyperinosis (-ot-) + -ic.] Pertaining to or characterized by hyperinosis.

hyperionian (hî'pér-i-ō'ni-an), a. [hyper- + Ionian.] See under mode.

hyperionic (hî'pér-i-on'ik), a. [hyper- + ionic.] Same as hyperionian.

hyperite (hî'pér-it), n. [Short for hypersthenite.] A name given at various times and by various writers to rocks of very uncertain and indeterminate character. Some of the rocks designated as hyperite belong with diabase, and others with diorite. Some writers have used hyperite as the equivalent of hypersthene. The latest use of it, and that adopted by Rosenbusch, is by Törnbohm, who designates under the name of hyperite a rock intermediate in character between normal gabbro and olivine gabbro. Also called hypersthene gabbro.

hyperjacobian (hî'pér-ja-kō'bi-an), a. [hyper- + Jacobian.] In math., derived from a complication of the idea of a Jacobian surface or curve. If U = 0 is a surface of degree n, and $\phi = 0$, $\psi = 0$, etc., are surfaces of the same degree m, generally different from n, if $D_x U = u$, $D_y U = v$, $D_z U = w$, $D_x \phi = \phi$, $D_y \phi = \delta$, $D_z \phi = \delta$, $D_x \psi = \alpha$, $D_y \psi = \beta$, $D_z \psi = \gamma$, etc., be symbols of any higher derivatives, let the following matrix be formed:

$$\begin{vmatrix} u & v & w & \phi & \Delta U & \Delta' U & \dots \\ \alpha & \beta & \gamma & \delta & \Delta \phi & \Delta' \phi & \dots \\ \alpha' & \beta' & \gamma' & \delta' & \Delta \psi & \Delta' \psi & \dots \end{vmatrix}$$

This matrix must have one more column than it has rows. From this two independent determinants may be formed; and these being equated to zero give the equations to the hyperjacobian surfaces of the system, while their intersection is the hyperjacobian curve.

hyperkinesis, hypercinesis (hî'pér-ki-nē'sis, -si-nē'sis), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑπέρ, over, + κίνησις, movement, < κινέω, move.] In pathol., abnormal amount of muscular action; spasmodic action; spasm. Also hyperkinesia, hypercinesia.

hyperkinetic, hypercnetic (hî'pér-ki-nē'tik, -si-nē'tik), a. [hyperkinesis, after kinetic.] Relating to or characterized by hyperkinesis.

hyperlydian (hī-pér-lid'i-an), a. [< hyper- + Lydian.] See under mode.

hypermedication (hī-pér-med-i-kā'shon), n. [< hyper- + medication.] In med., the excessive use of drugs.

hypermetamorphic (hī-pér-met-a-môr'fik), a. [< hyper- + metamorphic.] Characterized by or exhibiting hypermetamorphism; undergoing repeated transformations.

hypermetamorphism (hī-pér-met-a-môr'fiz'm), n. [< hyper- + metamorphism.] In entom., the character of being subject to hypermetamorphosis; the process of undergoing complete transformation. Hypermetamorphism is a type of development found in beetles of the families Meloidæ, Rhipiphoridae, and Stylopidae, in which an active larva-stage is followed by one or two inactive stages (the last called the pseudo-pupa) before the true pupa-state is attained. Many of the insects characterized by hypermetamorphism are parasitic in or on the bodies of Hymenoptera during at least a part of their lives. Some insects pass through no fewer than six recognizable stages after hatching from the egg and before reaching maturity. In the case of the blister-beetles or meloids these stages have been severally named, from the resemblance the larva bear to those of certain other insects, as, 1st, trilinguini; 2d, caraboid; 3d and 4th, scaraboid; 5th, coarctate; 6th, scolytoid.

Hypermetamorphism is a term applied to certain conditions in which the larva at one period of its life assumes a very different form and habit from those of another period.

Encyc. Brit., XIII. 147.

hypermetamorphosis (hī-pér-met-a-môr'fō-sis), n. [< hyper- + metamorphosis.] In entom., complete metamorphosis; radical transformation; change from one form to a very different one. See hypermetamorphism.

Certain beetles . . . undergo what has been called a hyper-metamorphosis; that is, they pass through an early stage wholly different from the ordinary grub-like larva.

Darwin, Var. of Animals and Plants, p. 363.

hypermetamorphotic (hī-pér-met'a-môr-fot'ik), a. [< hypermetamorphosis (-ot-) + -ic.] Same as hypermetamorphic. [Rare.]

The extraordinary genus Sitaris (equally hypermetamorphotic), a parasite in bees' nests.

Encyc. Brit., XIII. 149.

hypermetaphorical (hī-pér-met-a-for'i-kal), a. [< hyper- + metaphorical.] Excessively metaphorical.

Entangled, hypermetaphorical style.

Carlyle, Sartor Resartus, p. 203.

hypermeter (hī-pér-me-tēr), n. [< LL. hypermeter (Diomedes, Marius Victorinus), < Gr. ὑπερμετρος, going beyond the meter, beyond measure, < ὑπέρ, beyond, + μέτρον, meter, measure.] 1. In pros.: (a) A verse or period having one more syllable at the end than properly belongs to the meter which it represents; especially, a heroic hexameter with an additional syllable in the last foot, usually intended to be elided by synapheia before a vowel beginning the next line; as a dolichurus. (b) A period consisting of more than two or three cola; a hypermetron. (c) A line or meter with one syllable beyond the last complete foot or measure. The word is not infrequently found in this sense in books on English versification; but it is a departure from the original nomenclature of prosody. 2. Anything greater than the ordinary standard of measure. [Rare.]

When a man rises beyond six foot, he is an hypermeter, and may be admitted into the tall club.

Addison, The Tall Club.

hypermetra, n. Plural of hypermetron.

hypermetric (hī-pér-met'rik), a. [< hypermeter + -ic.] In pros.: (a) Exceeding the correct measure; having a syllable at the end in excess of the meter represented; especially, dolichuric: as, a hypermetric verse or line. (b) Of more than usual length; more than dolichic or tricollic: as, a hypermetric period. See hypermeter, hypermetron.

hypermetrical (hī-pér-met'ri-kal), a. [< hypermetric + -al.] Same as hypermetric.

hypermetron (hī-pér-me-tron), n.; pl. hypermetra (trî). [< Gr. ὑπερμετρον, neut. of ὑπερμετρος, beyond the meter: see hypermeter.] In anc. pros., a period exceeding the usual extent of a meter; a period longer than the ordinary line or verse.

hypermetropia (hī-pér-met-rōp'), n. [< hypermetropia, without the suffix.] A person affected with hypermetropia.

When the hypermetropia wishes to examine anything close to him, an undue amount of convergence will direct the axis of vision to a point nearer than the object looked at.

New York Med. Jour., XL. 719.

hypermetropia (hī-pér-me-trō'pī-ā), n. [< Gr. ὑπέρ, over, + μέτρον, measure, + ὥψ (ὥπ-), eye.] A natural or acquired condition of the eyes in which the focus (that is, of parallel rays when the accommodation is completely relaxed) falls behind the retina; long-sightedness: the opposite of myopia. Also hyperopia, hypermetropia, and hyperpresbyopia.—Absolute hypermetropia, hypermetropia in which parallel rays cannot be brought to a focus on the retina by an exertion of the eye.—Facultative hypermetropia, hypermetropia in which parallel rays can be focused on the retina without converging the visual lines.—Latent hypermetropia, that hypermetropia which is not detected by finding the strongest convex lens with which the patient can focus parallel rays on the retina, but which, being due to involuntary accommodation, may reveal itself after the use of convex glasses for a while, or the instillation of atropin.—Manifest hypermetropia, that hypermetropia which is determined by finding the strongest convex lens with which the patient can focus parallel rays on the retina.—Relative hypermetropia, hypermetropia in which parallel rays can be focused on the retina only by converging the visual lines.

hypermetropic (hī-pér-me-trop'ik), a. [< hypermetropia + -ic.] Pertaining to or affected with hypermetropia; far-sighted.

When . . . the hypermetropic eye loses its power of adjustment with age, then even distant objects can not be seen distinctly. Such persons, therefore, while young, should habitually wear slightly convex glasses, which make their eyes normal.

Le Conte, Sight, p. 52.

hypermetropy (hī-pér-met-rō-pi), n. [< NL. hypermetropia] Same as hypermetropia.

hermixolydian (hī-pér-mik-sō-lid'i-an), a. [< hyper- + mixolydian.] See under mode.

hypermnnesia (hī-pér-mē'si-ā), n. [< Gr. ὑπέρ, over, beyond, + μνήσις, remembrance.] Unusual power of recollection.

The phenomena, whether of amnesia or hypermnnesia, which mesmerists allege, reach no such marvellous pitch as this.

Proc. Soc. Psych. Research, I. 283.

hypermyriorama (hī-pér-mir'i-rā-rā'mā), n. [< Gr. ὑπέρ, over, beyond, + μυρίος, countless, myriad, + ράμα, a view, < ὁρᾶν, see. Cf. panorama.] An exhibition consisting of innumerable views. [Imp. Dict.] hypernic (hī-pér-nik), n. [A trade-name, < hyper- + Nic(aragua wood), or nic(ric), itself < Nic(aragua wood).] Among American dyers, Nicaragua wood, or any other red wood or red-wood extract of the same class. J. W. Slater.

hyperoa, n. Plural of hyperoön.

hyperoartia (hī-pér-ō-ār'ti-ā), n. pl. [< Gr. ὑπερῶς, being above, upper (see hyperoön), + ἄρτος, complete, perfect, < ἄρτι, just, exactly.] A primary subdivision of myzonts, marsipobranchiates, or Cyclostomata, including forms with the roof of the mouth or palate entire or imperforate, the single nasal duct not penetrating into it. Various values have been assigned to it. By J. Müller it was regarded as an order; by Günther it was ranked as a suborder; and by E. R. Lankester it was raised to the rank of a class of vertebrates. Its only living representatives belong to the family of Petromyzontidae or lampreys.

hyperoartian (hī-pér-ō-ār'ti-an), a. and n. I. a. Pertaining to or having the characters of the Hyperoartia.

II. n. One of the Hyperoartia.

Hyperodon (hī-pér-ō-don), n. Same as Hyperoödon.

Hyperoödon (hī-pér-ō-ō-don), n. [< Gr. ὑπερῶς, being above, upper, + ὄδον (ὄδοντ-) = E. tooth.] A genus of whales of the family Physeteridae and subfamily Ziphiinae; the typical bottle-nosed whales. They have a globular head, rising abruptly from a small distinct snout, whence the name bottlenose. The vertebrae number 45; the cervical vertebrae are ankylized; and there is a small concealed tooth at the end of each mandibular ramus. The details of cranial structure are characteristic, in relation with the peculiar shape of the head. H. rostratus and H. latirostris inhabit the north Atlantic, attaining a length of from 20 to 30 feet; the former is the common bottlenose. The genus was founded by Lacépède in 1803. Anarctus is a synonym.

Hyperoödontidae (hī-pér-ō-ō-don'ti-dē), n. pl. [< NL. < Hyperoödon (-t-) + -idae.] A family of toothed whales, named from the genus Hyperoödon: same as the subfamily Ziphiinae.

hyperoön (hī-pér-ō-on), n.; pl. hyperoä (ā). [< Gr. ὑπερῶν, an upper story or room, neut. of ὑπερῶς, being above, upper, < ὑπέρ, above: see hyper-.] In Gr. antiq., an upper story in a building; particularly, a gallery over a side aisle in a temple.

hyperopia (hī-pér-ō-pī-ā), n. [< Gr. ὑπέρ, over, + ὥψ (ὥπ-), eye.] Same as hypermetropia.

hyperopic (hī-pér-op'ik), a. [< hyperopia + -ic.] Pertaining to or exhibiting hypermetropia.

The glass, however, which will correct the simple hypermetropia or myopia will not answer for the hyperopic or myopic astigmatism.

New York Med. Jour., XL. 720.

hyperopsia (hī-pér-op'si-ā), n. [< Gr. ὑπέρ, over, + ὄψις, view: see optic.] Extremely acute vision.

hyperorexia (hī-pér-ō-rek'si-ā), n. [< Gr. ὑπέρ, over, + ὄρεξις, a longing: see orexis.] In pathol., excessive desire for food; inordinate appetite; bulimia.

hyperorthodox (hī-pér-ōr'thō-doks), a. [< hyper- + orthodox.] Extremely orthodox.

hyperorthodoxy (hī-pér-ōr'thō-dok-si), n. [< hyper- + orthodoxy.] Extreme orthodoxy.

hyperorthognathic (hī-pér-ōr-thog-nath'ik), a. [< hyperorthognath + -ic.] Exceedingly orthognathic; exhibiting hyperorthognathism.

hyperorthognathy (hī-pér-ōr-thog'nā-thi), n. [< hyper- + orthognathy.] In crami., excessive orthognathy, as when the cranial index is 91 or over.

hyperosmia (hī-pér-os'mi-ā), n. [< Gr. ὑπέρ, over, + ὀσμή, ὀσμή, a smell, odor: see osmum.] In pathol., excessive sensitiveness to odors.

hyperostosis (hī-pér-os-tō'sis), n. [< Gr. ὑπέρ, over, + ὀστέον, bone, + -osis.] 1. A morbid overgrowth of bone from a bone.—2. An overgrowth of bone; a normal (not morbid) exostosis or increase of bony tissue.

These bones are rough with a hyperostosis of their surfaces.

Stand. Nat. Hist., III. 319.

Hyperotreta (hī-pér-ō-trē'tā), n. pl. [< Gr. ὑπερῶς, being above, upper (see hyperoön), + τρητός, perforated, verbal adj. of τρηάω, perforate.] A primary subdivision of myzonts, embracing forms with the roof of the mouth perforated by the single nasal canal. It has been variously ranked as an order by J. Müller, as a suborder by Günther, and as a class of vertebrates by E. R. Lankester. Its few living representatives have been combined in one family, Myxiniidae, by some ichthyologists, and by others have been segregated into two, Myxiniidae and Bdellostomidae or Heptastemidae. Also called Hyperotretti.

hyperotretan (hī-pér-ō-trē'tan), a. and n. [< Hyperotreta + -an.] I. a. Pertaining to or having the characters of the Hyperotreta. Also hyperotrete, hyperotretous.

II. n. One of the Hyperotreta.

hyperotrete (hī-pér-ō-trēt), a. and n. Same as hyperotretan.

hyperotretous (hī-pér-ō-trē'tus), a. [< Hyperotreta + -ous.] Same as hyperotretan.

hyperoxidation (hī-pér-ok-si-dā'shon), n. [< hyper- + oxidation.] Excessive oxidation.

hyperoxygenated (hī-pér-ok'si-jen-ā-ted), a. [< hyper- + oxygenated.] Supersaturated with oxygen.

hyperoxygenation (hī-pér-ok'si-je-nā'shon), n. [< hyper- + oxygenation.] The state of being hyperoxygenated.

hyperoxygenized (hī-pér-ok'si-jen-izd), a. [< hyper- + oxygenized.] Same as hyperoxygenated.

hyperparasite (hī-pér-par'a-sīt), n. [< hyper- + parasite.] A hyperparasitic insect, or one which exhibits hyperparasitism.

hyperparasitic (hī-pér-par-a-sīt'ik), a. [< hyper- + parasitic.] Parasitic upon a parasite; characterized by or exhibiting hyperparasitism, as many insects.

Various parasitic and hyper-parasitic groups [of ants].

Nature, XXXIV. 16.

hyperparasitism (hī-pér-par'a-sīt-izm), n. [< hyper- + parasitism.] In entom., the parasitism of certain Ichneumonidae, Chalcididae, etc., which in the larval state live in the bodies of other insect parasites.

hyperpharyngeal (hī-pér-fa-rin'jē-āl), a. [< Gr. ὑπέρ, over, + φάρυγξ, throat (pharynx): see pharynx, pharyngeal.] Situated over or above the pharynx.

The hyperpharyngeal groove of Amphioxus.

Microsc. Science, XXVII. 350.

hyperphasia (hī-pér-fā'zi-ā), n. [< Gr. ὑπέρ, over, + φάσις, speaking, < φάω, say, speak.] In pathol., lack of control of the organs of speech.

hyperphasic (hī-pér-fā'zik), a. [< hyperphasia + -ic.] Affected with hyperphasia.

hyperphenomenal (hī-pér-fē-nom'e-nal), a. [< Gr. ὑπέρ, over, + φαινόμενα, phenomena: see phenomenal.] Superior to the phenomenal; noumenal.

About the hyperphenomenal reality of our own existence, the existence of God, and the existence of matter.

Encyc. Brit., XIV. 761.

hyperphrygian (hī-pér-frij'i-an), a. [< hyper- + Phrygian.] See under mode.

hyperphysical (hī-pér-fiz'ik-al), a. [< hyper- + physical.] Superior to matter; higher than the physical; immaterial.

Vital powers cannot be merely physical, and we must believe in something hyper-physical, something of the nature of a soul.

Whewell.

hyperphysics (hî-pér-fîz'iks), n. [< Gr. ὑπερ, over, + φυσικά, physics: see physics. Cf. metaphysics.] The science of that which transcends physics.

Medicine, physics, metaphysics, and hyperphysics.
Schaff, Hist. Christ. Church, I. § 15.

hyperplasia (hî-pér-plā'si-ă), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑπερ, over, + πλάσις, a forming, < πλάσσειν, form, mold.] In pathol., overgrowth of a part due to multiplication of its cells; excessive cell-reproduction. Compare hypertrophy, 1.

Interstitial hyperplasia of the connective tissue.
Buck's Handbook of Med. Sciences, IV. 659.

hyperplastic (hî-pér-plas'tik), a. [< hyperplasia + -ic.] Same as hyperplastic.

hyperplastic (hî-pér-plas'tik), a. [< Gr. ὑπερ, over, + πλαστός, formed, < πλάσσειν, form. Cf. hyperplasia.] Pertaining to or exhibiting hyperplasia: as, a hyperplastic tonsil.

The cervix was composed of dense, hard, hyperplastic tissue, almost cartilaginous in character.

Medical News, XLIX. 383.

hyperpnœa (hî-pér-nē'ă), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑπερ, over, + πνοή, breathing, < πνέειν, breathe.] In pathol., energetic or labored respiration.

hyperpyrexia (hî-pér-pi-rek'si-ă), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑπερ, over, + πυρετός, be feverish, < πυρετός, a fever: see pyretic.] In pathol., a high degree of pyrexia or fever.

hyperpyrexial (hî-pér-pi-rek'si-ăl), a. [< hyperpyrexia + -al.] Pertaining to or exhibiting hyperpyrexia.

hyper-resonance (hî-pér-rez'ô-nans), n. [< hyper + resonance.] Exaggerated resonance.

hypersarcoma (hî-pér-sär-kô'mă), n.; pl. hypersarcomata (-mă-tă). [NL., < Gr. ὑπερσάρκωμα, overgrown flesh, < ὑπερσάρκωσις, have or get an excess of flesh, < ὑπερ, over, + σάρξ (σαρ-), flesh. Cf. sarcoma.] In pathol., proud or fungous flesh.

hypersarcosis (hî-pér-sär-kô'sis), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑπερσάρκωσις, an overgrowth of flesh, < ὑπερσάρκωσις, have an excess of flesh: see hypersarcoma.] Same as hypersarcoma.

hypersecretion (hî-pér-sē-kre'shon), n. [< hyper + secretion.] Excessive secretion.

Catarrh is essentially a hypersecretion of the epithelium.
Encyc. Brit., XVIII. 378.

hypersensitive (hî-pér-sen'si-tiv), a. [< hyper + sensitive.] Excessively sensitive.

There have descended to us numerous persons whose nerves are naturally hypersensitive.

Nineteenth Century, XXII. 659.

hypersensitiveness (hî-pér-sen'si-tiv-nes), n. [< hypersensitive + -ness.] The state or character of being over-sensitive.

My pictures are likely to remain as private as the utmost hypersensitiveness could desire.

George Eliot, Daniel Deronda, xxxvii.

hypersensual (hî-pér-sen'su-ăl), a. [< hyper + sensual.] Same as supersensual.

hyperspace (hî-pér-spās), n. [< hyper + space.] A space of more than three dimensions.

The notion of the quasi-geometrical representation of objects by means of loci in hyperspace is employed by Salmon.

Cayley, On Curves which Satisfy Given Conditions (1867).

hyperspherical (hî-pér-sfer'i-ăl), a. [< hyper + spherical.] Originating from an extension of the conception of spherical harmonics.—Hyperspherical function of the first kind, the function $P_n(l, x)$ when $\Sigma a^2 P_n(l, x)$ is the development by powers of a of $1/(a^2 - 2ax + 1)$.—Hyperspherical function of the second kind, a function, $Q_n(l, x)$, related to the hyperspherical function of the first kind as Q is related to P in ordinary spherical functions.

hypersthene (hî-pér-stēn), n. An erroneous form of hypersthene.

hypersthene (hî-pér-stēn), n. [So named from its difficult fragility as compared with hornblende, with which it was formerly confounded; < Gr. ὑπερ, over, + σθένος, strength.] A mineral related to pyroxene, but orthorhombic in crystallization. It is a silicate of iron and magnesium. It was early called Labrador hornblende. Its color is between grayish and greenish black, but often with a peculiar copper-red luster or shimmer on the cleavage-surfaces, due to the presence of minute inclusions. It is usually found foliated and massive.—Hypersthene andesite. See andesite.—Hypersthene gabbro. Same as hyperite.—Hypersthene rock. Same as hypersthene.

hypersthenia (hî-pér-stēn'i-ă), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑπερ, over, + σθένος, strength.] In pathol., a condition characterized by extreme excitement of all the vital phenomena.

hypersthenic (hî-pér-stēn'ik), a. [< hypersthenia + -ic.] In pathol., relating to, characterized by, or producing over-excitement; stimulating; stimulated.

hypersthenic (hî-pér-stēn'ik), a. [< hypersthene + -ic.] Containing hypersthene; resembling hypersthene.

hypersthenite (hî-pér-stēn'it), n. [< hypersthene + -ite.] The name given by Naumann to a crystalline aggregate of labradorite and hypersthene, for which the name norite is now preferred. It is a rock closely allied to gabbro. Also called hypersthenite rock.

hyperthesis (hî-pér-thē'sis), n. [< Gr. ὑπερθεσις, a passing over, a transposition (also excess, the superlative degree), < ὑπερτίθεσθαι, put over, set over, put off (in mid. exceed), < ὑπερ, over, + τίθεσθαι, set, put, > θέσις, a putting down: see thesis.] 1. In anc. pros., interchange of quantity in two successive places of a logaedic series, so that in one of two lines metrically corresponding, as in strophe and antistrophe, a long is apparently transferred to a position before a short, which it would normally succeed, or a short transferred so as to exchange places with a preceding long. See polyschematic.—2. In philol., a transfer or "attraction" of a letter from the syllable to which it originally belonged to another syllable immediately preceding or following it; orthographic transposition, or metathesis: thus, in Greek, μέλαινα is used for *μελαινά.—3. In the Gr. Ch., a fast in addition to those regularly observed.

hyperthetic (hî-pér-thet'ik), a. [< Gr. ὑπερθετικός, superlative (cf. hyperthesis), < ὑπερτίθεσθαι, set over: see hyperthesis, and cf. superlative.] Pertaining to, affected by, or exemplifying hyperthesis: as, the hyperthetic form (of a foot or meter); a hyperthetic license.

hyperthetical (hî-pér-thet'i-ăl), a. [As hyperthetic + -al.] Superlative.

But herein this case is ruled against such men, that they affirm these hyperthetical or superlative sort of expressions and illustrations are too bold, and bombasted.

Chapman, Iliad, xv., Comment.

hypertrichosis (hî-pér-tri-kô'sis), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑπερ, over, + τρίχ- (τριχ-), hair, + -osis.] An abnormally large development of hair either locally or generally over the body.

hypertridimensional (hî-pér-tri-di-men'shon-ăl), a. [< hyper + tridimensional.] In math., having more than three dimensions.

hypertrophic (hî-pér-trof'ik), a. [< hypertrophy + -ic.] Pertaining to hypertrophy; producing or tending to produce hypertrophy.

hypertrophical (hî-pér-trof'i-ăl), a. [< hypertrophy + -ic-al.] Of the nature of hypertrophy; hypertrophic.

hypertrophous (hî-pér-trô-fus), a. [< hypertrophy + -ous.] Characterized by hypertrophy: as, hypertrophous cirrhosis.

hypertrophy (hî-pér-trô-fî), n. [< Gr. ὑπερ, over, + τροφή, nutrition, < τρέφειν, nourish.] 1. In pathol., an enlargement of a part of the body from excessive growth or multiplication of its elements; specifically, an enlargement due to growth of the individual elements, as distinguished from hyperplasia, where there is a multiplication of the cellular elements. Hence—2. Figuratively, excessive growth or accumulation of any kind.

Nights of financial hypertrophy.

The Century, XXVI. 419.

Language is not swift enough to give expression to his [the hashish-eater's] rapid thoughts. There is, as it were, an hypertrophy of ideas. What in the normal state would cause very trifling discomfort, now (from the effects of hashish) becomes an unbearable evil, and the patient cries and begs for commiseration.

Pop. Sci. Mo., Aug., 1878, p. 483.

3. In bot., a general term for all cases of excessive growth and increased size in the organs of plants, whether the increase is general or in a single direction. It includes enlargements, or swollen and thickened conditions, which usually result from a disproportionate formation of the cellular tissue as contrasted with the woody framework of the plant, as in the rootstocks of the cultivated carrots, turnips, etc.; elongations, as of roots searching for water; and enation, or excessive development, consisting in the formation of supplementary lobes or excrescences from various organs.—Concentric hypertrophy, thickening of the heart-wall with diminished cavity.—Eccentric hypertrophy of the heart, increase in size of a heart-cavity, accompanied by hypertrophy of the substance of its wall. Also called hypertrophy with dilatation.—Simple hypertrophy, thickening of the heart-wall with unchanged cavity.
hypertrophied (hî-pér-trô-fî), v. t.; pret. and pp. hypertrophied, ppr. hypertrophying. [< hypertrophy, n.] To become hypertrophous or enlarged from excessive nutrition.

When a tissue manifests an abnormal tendency to overgrowth, it is said to hypertrophy.

Ziegler, Pathol. Anat. (trans.), I. § 72.

hypertypic (hî-pér-tip'ik), a. [< hyper + typic.] Surpassing the type; atypic to an extreme degree. Compare hypotypic.

hypertypical (hî-pér-tip'i-ăl), a. [< hypertypic + -al.] Same as hypertypic.

They [Oceanic negroes] are represented, in what may be called a hypertypical form, by the extremely dolichocephalic Kai Colos, or mountaineers of the interior of the Feejee Islands.

W. H. Flower, Pop. Sci. Mo., XXVIII. 318.

hypethral, hypæthral (hî-pê'thral), a. [< L. hypæthrus, < Gr. ὑπαίθερος, under the sky, < ὑπό (= L. sub), under, + αἶθρ, the sky: see ether¹.] Open to the sky; roofless; not covered in; in the open air, as a court, inclosure, or place.

From time immemorial, in hot and rainy lands, a hypæthral court surrounded by a covered portico, either circular or square, was used for the double purpose of church and mart.

R. F. Burton, El-Mednah, p. 74.

To this day the Mohammedan mosque retains the outer hypæthral court.

Edinburgh Rev., CLXIII. 209.

It is noticeable, too, in passing, what a hypæthral story it ["Don Quixote"] is, how much of it passes in the open air, how the sun shines, the birds sing, the brooks dance, and the leaves murmur in it.

Lowell, Don Quixote.

In architecture hypæthral is specifically applied to a supposed ancient type of building lighted by the omission of a large section of the roof. This notion is based upon interpretations of Vitruvius and the negative evidence afforded until now by the lack of remains explaining methods of lighting among the ruins of Greek temples. It is certain, however, that no Greek temple with its contained art treasures was ever intentionally exposed in this way to the weather. The temples called hypæthral by Greek writers were roofless either from accident or from being unfinished. In the smaller Greek temples it is probable that daylight was admitted only by the door, and that it was supplemented by artificial light. In large temples, such as the Parthenon at Athens, of which the cells in the interior was 100 feet long, it is improbable that the lighting was wholly artificial; but no satisfactory explanation has yet been given of its management. It has been conjectured that such interiors were lighted by a system of narrow open channels in the roof, over the side aisles, or by series of apertures in the roof serving as windows, and capable of being closed. There was no break in the ridge-line of the roof, and no superstructure or clearstory rising above the roof. See cut under temple.

hypha (hî-fă), n.; pl. hyphæ (-fê). [NL., < Gr. ὑφή, a weaving, a web, < ὑφ-αίειν, weave, = AS. wēfan, E. weave: see web, weave.] The element of a thallus in Fungi; a cylindric thread-like branched body consisting of a membrane inclosing protoplasm, developing by apical growth, and usually becoming transversely septate as it develops. Göbel. It is the filament or thread of a fungus. The vegetative or growing hyphae taken in quantity are called the mycelium. The ascogenous hyphae are the hyphae or cells from which the asci are derived, as in the sporocarps of some Ascomycetes. See fungus.

hyphæmia, n. See hyphemia.

Hyphæne (hî-fê-nê), n. [NL. (Gärtner, 1801), < Gr. ὑφάειν, weave: see hypha.] A genus of palms of the tribe Borasseæ, with branching trunks, each branch terminating in a tuft of large fan-shaped leaves, from among which the branching catkin-like spikes of flowers are produced. The different sexes are in separate trees. The fruit has a thick fibrous rind with a smooth polished skin, inclosing a single hollow seed. Nine species are known, natives of tropical Africa, Arabia, and Madagascar. H. Thebaica is the gingerbread-tree or doom-palm.

hyphæresis, n. See hyphæresis.

hyphal (hî-fal), a. [< hypha + -al.] Pertaining to or of the nature of a hypha: as, hyphal tissue.

In Lichens the thallus consists of a hyphal element of anastomosing and interlacing filaments.

Encyc. Brit., IV. 107.

Hyphantes (hî-fan'têz), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑφάντης, a weaver, < ὑφάειν, weave: see hypha.] 1. A genus of American orioles, of a family Icteridae, established by Vieillot in 1816, in the form Yphantes, for such species as the Baltimore oriole and the orchard-oriole. See Icterus, 3.—2. A genus of arachnids. Billberg, 1820.

Hyphantornis (hî-fan-tôr'nîs), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑφάντης, a weaver, < ὑφάειν, weave: see hypha.] A leading genus of African weaver-birds, of the family Ploceidae, covering a large number of species usually classed under Ploceus or Textor, such as H. cucullata. G. R. Gray, 1840.

Hyphantria (hî-fan'tri-ă), n. [NL.,

Fall Web-worm (Hyphantria cunea), natural size. a, caterpillar; b, pupa; c, moth.

< Gr. ὑφάντρια, fem. of ὑφάντης, a weaver: see Hyphantria.] A genus of bombycid moths, having wings like those of Spilosoma, from which it differs in the labial palpi, of which the second joint is very short, and the terminal joint almost rudimentary. H. cunea is a common species, which forms a web on forest- and shade-trees, in which the larvae live gregariously; they are known as fall web-worms. Harris, 1841.

hyphasma (hi-faz'-mā), n.; pl. hyphasmata (-mā-tā). [NL., < Gr. ὑφάσμα, a thing woven, a web, robe, < ὑφαίνω, weave: see hypha.] 1. In bot., a name formerly applied to certain non-fructifying mycelial growths common in damp, dark places. They probably represent the sterile mycelia of some of the higher fungi. — 2. In the Gr. Ch., one of four small pieces of cloth, embroidered with the names or symbols of the evangelists, placed on the angles of the mensa or top of the altar, before it is vested with the catasarca and ependysis.

hyphemia, hyphæmia (hi-fē'-mi-ā), n. [NL. hyphæmia, < Gr. ὑφαιμία, suffused with blood, bloodshot, < ὑπό, under, + αἷμα, blood.] In pathol.: (a) Deficiency of blood. (b) Extravasation of blood.

hyphen (hi'-fen), n. [LL. hyphen, n. and adv., < Gr. ὑφέν, a sign (✓) for joining two syllables or words, also used in music, prob. to indicate that two notes were to be blended together; prop. an adv., ὑφέν, or rather a phrase, ὑφ' ἐν, under one, into one, together, as one word: ὑφ', aspirated form before the rough breathing of ἵπ-, the form before a vowel of ὑπό, under; ἐν, neut. acc. of εἷς, one.] 1. In paleography, a curve placed below the line so as to unite the parts of a compound word, and to indicate that they are not to be separated or read as distinct words: as, δοσκούροι—that is, δόσκούροι, not

Δῶς κούροι; περικλέους—that is, περικλέους, not περὶ κλέους; αντερόλans—that is, αντερόλans, not ante volans, etc. In its use the hyphen is the exact opposite of the diastole or hypodistole.

2. In writing and printing, a short line (—) used to connect two words or elements: namely, (a) to connect two words which are so used as properly to form a compound word; (b) to join syllables which are for any purpose arbitrarily separated, as in regular syllabification (as in el-e-men-tal), at the end of a line to connect the syllables of a divided word (as in the third line of this paragraph), to indicate the pronunciation (as in the respellings for the pronunciation in this dictionary), and to indicate or separate the etymological parts of a word, stem, affixes, etc., often without regard to the syllables (as in element-al, intro-duct-ion, sup-spic-ious). At the end of such an etymological element it indicates a prefix, as a-, in-, pro-, etc.; before an element it indicates a suffix, as -a-, -in-, -ous, etc.

Hyphen is, as it were, a band uniting whol words joined in composition; as, a hand-maid.

A. Hume, Orthographie (E. E. T. S.), p. 23.

hyphen (hi'-fen), v. t. [< hyphen, n.] To join by a hyphen, as two words, so as to form a compound word. Also hyphenize, hyphenate.

hyphenate (hi'-fen-āt), v. t.; pret. and pp. hyphenated, ppr. hyphenating. [< hyphen + -ate².] Same as hyphen.

hyphenation (hi-fe-nā'-shon), n. [< hyphenate + -ion.] The act of joining with a hyphen, or the state of being so joined; use of hyphens.

The folio does not differ in the way of italicising, hyphenation, etc., from scores of books at that time.

The Academy, April 21, 1883, p. 278.

hyphenic (hi'-fen-ik), a. [< hyphen + -ic.] Of or pertaining to the hyphen.

The following I should call a hyphenic error.
N. and Q., 1st ser., IV. 204.

hyphenization (hi'-fen-i-zā'-shon), n. [< hyphen + -ize + -ation.] The act of hyphenating, or the condition of being hyphenated.

A neglect of mental hyphenization often leads to mistake as to an author's meaning, particularly in this age of morbid implication.
N. and Q., 1st ser., IV. 204.

hyphenize (hi'-fen-iz), v. t. Same as hyphen.

hyphæresis, hyphæresis (hi-fer'-e-sis), n. [NL. hyphæresis, < Gr. ὑφαίρεσις, a taking away, in the omission of a letter, < ὑφαίρειν, take away from under, < ὑπό, under, + αἵρειν, take.] In philol., the act of taking away or shortening: as, syllabic hyphæresis.

hyphodrome (hi-fō'-drōm), a. [< Gr. ὑφή, a weaving, + δρόμος, a running.] In bot., having all the veins except the midrib more or less deeply buried in the thick mesophyll, and very indistinctly visible or wholly concealed: a term introduced into the nomenclature of leaf-nerivation by Ettingshausen in 1854. See nerivation.

Hyphomycetes (hi-fō-mi-sē-tēz), n. pl. [NL. (Link, 1824), < Gr. ὑφή, a web (see hypha), + μυκήτης, pl. μυκήτες, a mushroom, fungus.] One of the six principal groups into which all fungi have been divided, characterized by having the spores naked, on conspicuous threads. It includes Peronosporaceae, Penicillium, etc. In modern systems of classification the Hyphomycetes are referred to what are called fungi imperfecti, or imperfectly known forms, many of which are known or suspected to be actual stages of Ascomycetes. The groups include all fungi composed simply of branched or unbranched hyphae. Also called filamentous fungi.

hyphomycetous (hi-fō-mi-sē-tus), a. [< Hyphomycetes.] Pertaining or relating to, or characteristic of, the Hyphomycetes; contained in the group Hyphomycetes: as, hyphomycetous fungi.

The Entylomea, on the other hand, are simple hyphomycetous forms, and other species, those especially which live in leaves (species of Tilletia and Urocystis), are intermediate between the two extremes.

De Bary, Fungi (trans.), p. 172.

hyphostroma (hi-fō-strō'-mā), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑφή, a web, + στρώμα, a bed: see stroma, 2.] In bot., the mycelium or spawn of fungals. Lindley.

hyphidiomorphic (hip-id-i-ō-mōr'-fik), a. [< hypho-, + idiomorphic.] Partially or incompletely idiomorphic.

The order being first plagioclase in more or less idiomorphic lath-shaped individuals lying in all positions, then augite generally allotriomorphic, sometimes hyphidiomorphic.
Amer. Geologist, I. 204.

hyphidiomorphically (hip-id-i-ō-mōr'-fi-kal-i), adv. In a hyphidiomorphic manner; not entirely idiomorphically.

The rock is hyphidiomorphically granular.
Amer. Naturalist, XXII. 209.

hyposinosis (hip-i-nō'-sis), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑπό, under, + σιν (iv-), strength, fiber, + -osis.] In pathol., that condition of the blood in which an unusually small amount of fibrin is formed on clotting: opposed to hyperinosis.

hypnotic (hip-i-not'-ik), a. [< hypnosis (-ot-) + -ic.] Characterized by deficiency of fibrin.

hypisomerous (hip-i-som'-er-us), a. [NL., < Gr. ὑπό, under, + ἰσομερής, isomerous: see isomerous.] In odontog., noting molars in which the transverse ridges increase in number by one on successive teeth: opposed to isomerous: correlated with anisomerous.

Hypnæi (hip-nē'-i), n. pl. [NL., < Hypnum, q. v.] A natural order of pleurocarpous or lateral-fruited mosses, including the single genus Hypnum. Also called Hypnoideæ and Hypnææ.

hypnagogic (hip-na-gō'-jik), a. [< Gr. ὑπνός, sleep, + ἀγωγός, leading, < ἄγω, lead.] Leading to sleep; inducing sleep; hypnotic.

It has been noted by H. Meyer of "hypnagogic illusions," and by Gruithuisen of hallucinations which consist in the surviving of dream-images into waking moments, that they can give rise to after-images.

E. Gurney, Proc. Soc. Psych. Research, III. 180, note.

Hypnea (hip-nē'-ā), n. [NL., < Hypnum, q. v.] A genus of red or purple algae, belonging to the order Florideæ and the type of the sub-order Hypnææ. They have filiform fronds, virgately branched, with subulate branchlets, composed of an internal layer of large roundish-angular cells, which become smaller outward, and a cortex of small, colored, polygonal cells. The tetraspores are zontate, and the cystocarps are external and borne on the branchlets. The genus contains 25 or 30 species, mostly tropical and ill-defined. H. musciformis is found on the southern coast of New England.

Hypnæaceæ (hip-nē-ā'-sē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Agardh, 1876), < Hypnea + -aceæ.] An order of red algae, of the class Florideæ, including, according to Agardh, the tribes Endocladiceæ and Hypnææ and 7 genera.

Hypnææ (hip-nē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Agardh, 1876), < Hypnea + -ææ.] In bot.: (a) A tribe, or according to some authorities a suborder, of algae, typified by the genus Hypnea. The fronds are filiform or compressed, and branching; the tetraspores are zontate; and the cystocarps are external or partly immersed, and filled with a spongy cellular mass, in which the spores are borne in small tufts on a branching filamentous placenta. (b) Same as Hypnæi.

hypnabate (hip-nō-bāt), n. [< Gr. ὑπνός, sleep, + βατέω, verbal adj. of βαίω, go, = L. venire = E. come.] A sleep-walker; a somnambulist. [Rare.]

hypnobotia (hip-nō-bā'-ti-ā), n. [NL., < hypnobotæ, q. v.] Somnambulism; a condition of the brain which occasions the individual to execute during sleep some of those actions that take place in the waking state.

hypnocyst (hip-nō-sist), n. [< Gr. ὑπνός, sleep, + κύστις, bladder (cyst).] A sleeping cyst; a quiescent encysted protozoan which does not sporulate.

The sclerotia are similar to the hypnocysts and other Protozoa.
E. R. Lankester, Encyc. Brit., XIX. 841.

Some of the Ciliata (notably the common Vorticellæ) have been observed to enclose themselves in cysts; but it does not appear that these are anything more than "hypnocysts," from which the animal emerges unchanged after a period of drought or deficiency of food.

E. R. Lankester, Encyc. Brit., XIX. 864.

Hypnodes (hip-nō-dēz), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑπνώδης, of a sleepy nature, drowsy, < ὑπνός, sleep, + εἶδος, form.] A genus of crested gallinules, the only species of which is H. cristata, of India, Ceylon, and Java. Reichenbach, 1853.

hypnogenesis (hip-nō-jen'-e-sis), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑπνός, sleep, + γένεσις, generation.] The production of hypnotism; induction of the trance. Also hypnogeny.

hypnogenetic (hip-nō-jē-net'-ik), a. [< hypnogenesis, after genetic.] Same as hypnogenous.

Physical methods [of hypnotization], especially hypnogenetic zones, do not exist except as the results of suggestion.
Science, XII. 222.

hypnogenetically (hip-nō-jē-net'-i-kal-i), adv. By hypnogenesis; as regards hypnogenesis.

hypnogenic (hip-nō-jen'-ik), a. [< hypnogeny + -ic.] Same as hypnogenous.

Polarizing action is in general hypnogenic.
Amer. Jour. Psychol., I. 502.

hypnogenous (hip-noj'-e-nus), a. [< Gr. ὑπνός, sleep, + -γενής, producing: see -genous.] Producing hypnotism; inducing the hypnotic condition; pertaining to hypnogeny. Also hypnogenetic, hypnogenic.

No attempt . . . has been made to correlate this hypnogenous force or suggestion at a distance with hypnogenetic agencies employed in the subject's actual presence.
F. W. H. Myers, Proc. Soc. Psych. Research, Oct., 1886, [p. 127.]

hypnogeny (hip-noj'-e-ni), n. [< Gr. ὑπνός, sleep, + -γενία: see -geny.] Same as hypnogenesis.

Certain recent events, however, have given special importance to this topic of trance-induction or hypnogeny.
E. Gurney, Mind, XII. 214.

Hypnoideæ (hip-noi'-dē-ē), n. pl. [NL., < Hypnum + -oidææ.] Same as Hypnæi.

hypnological (hip-nō-loj'-i-kal), a. Of or pertaining to hypnology.

hypnologist (hip-nol'-ō-jist), n. [< hypnology + -ist.] One versed in hypnology.

hypnology (hip-nol'-ō-ji), n. [< Gr. ὑπνός, = L. somnus, sleep, + -λογία, < λέγω, speak: see -ology.] The sum of scientific knowledge concerning sleep.

hypnone (hip-nōn), n. [< Gr. ὑπνός, = L. somnus, sleep, + -ονα.] A crystalline substance (C₈H₈O) fusing at 15° C., boiling at 98° C., used in medicine as a hypnotic.

Various other hypnotics have been more recently proposed, such as . . . hypnone and methyal.
Medical News, LII. 547.

hypnophobia (hip-nō-fō'-bi-ā), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑπνός, sleep, + φόβος, fear.] A morbid dread of falling asleep.

hypnoscope (hip-nō-skōp), n. [< Gr. ὑπνός, sleep, + σκοπεῖν, view.] See the extract.

The hypnoscope, which is simply a small hollow magnet to be held on the finger, and, when thus giving rise to peculiar sensations, is claimed to show that the holder is a good hypnotic subject.
Science, X. 183.

hypnosis (hip-nō'-sis), n. [< Gr. ὑπνός, sleep, + -osis.] 1. The production of sleep. Dunghison. — 2. The hypnotic state; hypnotism.

In hypnosis, spontaneous or induced, there is often an exaltation of memory. Amer. Jour. of Psychol., I. 514.

hypnosperm (hip-nō-spērm), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑπνός, sleep, + σπέρμα, seed.] In bot., a resting spore; in algae, an oöspore or zygosperm, as the case may be, which after the act of fertilization has taken place sinks to the bottom of the water, where it passes through a period of rest before germinating. Also hypnosporæ.

It [the zygosperm] then remains dormant through the winter as a resting cell or hypnosporæ, germinating in the spring.
Bennett and Murray, Crypt. Bot., p. 266.

hypnosporange (hip-nō-spō-ran-j'), n. [< hypnosporangium.] Same as hypnosporangium.

hypnosporangium (hip-nō-spō-ran'-ji-um), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑπνός, sleep, + σπόρα, spore, + ἀγγεῖον, a cup.] In bot., a sporangium containing or inclosing hypnosporæ.

hypnosporæ (hip-nō-spōr), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑπνός, sleep, + σπόρα, a spore.] A resting spore; a spore that reposes some time before germinating. Compare hypnosperm.

hypnosporic (hip-nō-spor'ik), a. [< hypnosporē + -ic.] After the manner or nature of a hypnosporic.

hypnotic (hip-not'ik), a. and n. [= F. hypnotique, < LL. hypnoticus, < Gr. ὑπνωτικός, inclined to sleep, putting to sleep, < ὑπνόν, put to sleep, < ὕπνος, sleep, = L. somnus, sleep: see somnolent, etc.] I. a. 1. Having the property of producing sleep; tending to produce sleep; soporific.

The pulse, in from fifteen to thirty minutes after the hypnotic dose is taken, becomes accelerated some six or eight beats in a minute, but falls again to its previous rate before sleep ensues.

Buck's Handbook of Med. Sciences, III. 785.

2. Pertaining to or characterized by hypnotism.

According to Weinhold, the hypnotic state begins in a gradual loss of taste, touch, and the sense of temperature; next colors are imperfectly distinguished; then forms grow indistinct; and then the eye is immovable and nothing is seen. The ear never slept in his experiments. The subject believes, and at last does, all that is commanded. G. S. Hall, German Culture, p. 135.

II. n. 1. A medicine that produces or tends to produce sleep; an opiate; a soporific.

He writes as an hypnotic for the spleen.

Young, To Pope.

It should not be forgotten that the activity of hypnotics is increased by combination. Alien. and Neurol., VIII. 79.

2. One who is subject to hypnotism; one in whom hypnotism has been induced.

In certain cases the hypnotic is insensitive.

Science, XIII. 50.

It is a recognized fact that the senses of hypnotics fall completely under the control of the hypnotizer.

N. A. Rev., CXLVI. 705.

hypnotically (hip-not'ik-al-i), adv. By hypnotism; as regards hypnotism.

It would be a conceivable hypothesis that the trance-condition is produced hypnotically.

Proc. Soc. Psych. Research, I. 257.

hypnotisable, hypnotisation, etc. See hypnotizable, etc.

hypnotism (hip-nō-tizm), n. [= F. hypnotisme; as hypnotic + -ism.] An abnormal mental condition characterized by insensibility to most impressions of sense, with excessive sensibility to some impressions, and an appearance of total unconsciousness; especially, that variety of this condition which is artificially induced, usually by concentrating the attention of the subject upon some object of vision, as a bright bit of glass, or upon the operator, who generally aids in producing the result by making a few light passes with his hands. When in this condition, the mental action and the volition of the subject are to a large extent under the control of the operator. See mesmerism. Also called bradism.

Hypnotism or induced somnambulism, whether accompanied by consciousness or not, has been regarded as covering the whole ground. Proc. Soc. Psych. Research, I. 219.

Hypnotism may be regarded as an artificial catalepsy.

Encyc. Brit., XV. 282.

hypnotist (hip-nō-tist), n. [As hypnotic + -ist.] One who hypnotizes, or believes in hypnotism.

Attention has been frequently called to the affinity between transference of impressions obtained when the "subject" is in a normal state, and those results which have been held to indicate a special sympathy or "rapport" between a hypnotist or mesmerist and a sensitive "subject."

Proc. Soc. Psych. Research, II. 12.

hypnotistic (hip-nō-tis'tik), a. [< hypnotist + -ic.] Relating to or inducing hypnotism.

hypnotizability (hip-nō-ti-zā-bil'i-ti), n. [< hypnotizable: see -bility.] Susceptibility to hypnotization.

The author has invented an improved "hypnoscope" or little magnet, to be applied to the finger, and by the sensations then aroused to furnish a criterion of the hypnotizability of the subject. Amer. Jour. of Psychol., I. 520.

hypnotizable (hip-nō-ti-zā-bl), a. [< hypnotize + -able.] Susceptible to hypnotizing influences. Also spelled hypnotisable.

A hypnotizable hysterical girl.

Alien. and Neurol., VII. 406.

hypnotization (hip-nō-ti-zā'shon), n. [< hypnotize + -ation.] The act of hypnotizing, or the state of being hypnotized. Also spelled hypnotisation.

Binet holds, many persons who are slightly hypnotizable may resist hypnotization successfully, and ought to be responsible for consenting to submit themselves to the experiment. Science, IX. 221.

hypnotized (hip-nō-tiz), v. t.; pret. and pp. hypnotized, ppr. hypnotizing. [As hypnotic + -ize.] To bring into the condition of hypnotism. Also spelled hypnotise.

The hypnotizing process may carry a sensitive "subject" in a minute or less from a condition of normal waking into hypnotic sleep.

E. Gurney, Proc. Soc. Psych. Research, II. 63.

hypnotizer (hip-nō-ti-zēr), n. One who hypnotizes or produces hypnotism in another. Also spelled hypnotiser.

With early hypnotizers, "mesmerizers," or "magnetizers," these experiments were successful, almost without exception, with women only.

G. S. Hall, German Culture, p. 139.

hypnotoid (hip-nō-toid), a. [As hypnotic + -oid.] Like hypnotism; somewhat hypnotic; due to or resembling the hypnotic state.

The wonderful hypnotoid sensitiveness, leading up, weeks afterwards, to an accurately-timed hallucination. Proc. Amer. Soc. Psych. Research, March, 1889, p. 295.

Hypnum (hip'num), n. [NL., < Gr. ὕπνιον, moss growing on trees.] The largest genus of mosses, embracing 30 or more subgenera that have by many authors been considered as genera. It belongs to the series Pleuracarp, in which the fruit is lateral and sessile upon the stems or branches, and the sexual organs are in axillary buds. The capsule is solid, long-pedicellate, cernuous or horizontal, more or less incurved, not pendent, and very rarely erect and regular. The peristome is double, the outer consisting of 16 strong, densely articulate, lanceolate-acuminate teeth, the inner of a broad membrane divided to (or nearly to) the middle into 16 carinate yellow segments, alternating with the outer teeth and with intermediate cilia, which are either solitary or in groups of 2 or 3. The genus is widely distributed in all parts of the world. There are 200 North American and 90 or more British species. The genus is frequently found in a fossil state, about 30 extinct species having been described from the Miocene and Quaternary deposits of Europe, and from the arctic regions. One species (H. Haydenii) occurs in the Green River group (Eocene) of Colorado.

hypo¹ (hi'pō), n. Like hyp, an abbreviation of hypochochondria: commonly in the plural. [Colloq.]

Polly had strictly forbidden us even to mention that corner of the garret to Miss Mehtable, or to ask her leave to look at it, alleging as a reason that "t would bring on her hyppos." H. S. Stone, Oldtown, p. 333.

hypo² (hi'pō), n. In photog., a common abbreviation of hyposulphite of soda, a chemical extensively used in most photographic processes.

hypo- [L., etc., hypo-, < Gr. ὑπό, prep., under (in all senses), with deriv. meanings through, by, after, etc.; as a prefix, ὑπο-, under, sometimes diminutive in force; = L. sub, under: see sub-.] A prefix of Greek origin, cognate with sub- of Latin origin, and meaning primarily 'under,' either in place or in degree ('less,' 'less than'). Specifically—(a) In chem., indicating a lower place in a series of compounds, or inferior strength, as hyposulphurous acid, the lowest in the series of sulphur acids: opposed to hyper- or per-. (b) In anc. and mediæval music: (1) Of intervals, measured downward, as hypodiapente: opposed to hyper- and epi-. (2) Of modes and scales, beginning at a lower point, usually a perfect fourth below: opposed to hyper-.

hypoælian (hi'pō-ē-ō-li-an), a. [< hypo- + Æolian.] See under modæ.

hypoaria (hi'pō-ā-ri-ā), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. ὑπό, under, + αἶμα, dim. of αἶμα = L. ovum, an egg.] A pair of ganglia developed beneath the optic lobes of typical fishes.

In most osseous fishes the corresponding fibres of the prepyramidal tracts swell out suddenly, beneath the optic lobes, into two protuberant well-defined oval ganglions (hypoaria); their bulk is increased by added grey matter, which variegates their outer surface; they are well developed in the common cod, in which, as in some other fishes, they contain a cavity (hypoarian ventricle).

Quen. Anat. Vert., I. 279.

hypoarian (hi'pō-ā-ri-an), a. Of or relating to the hypoaria.—Hypoarian ventricle, a cavity within each of the hypoaria.

hypobacchius (hi'pō-ba-ki'us), n.; pl. hypobacchi (-i). [< Gr. ὑποβακχεύς, < ὑπό, under, + βακχεύς (sc. ποῦς), bacchius: see bacchius.] In anc. pros., a foot consisting of one short time or syllable followed by two longs, thus, — — —: usually called bacchius. See antibacchius, bacchius, palimbacchius.

hypobasal (hi'pō-bā'sal), a. [< Gr. ὑπό, under, + βασίς, base.] Behind the basal wall: in botany, a term used by Leitgeb to designate the posterior half of the developing proembryo of vascular cryptogams, or that part which becomes the root.

hypoblast (hi'pō-blāst), n. [< Gr. ὑπό, under, + βλαστός, a shoot, a bud, a germ.] 1. In bot., the flat dorsal cotyledon of a grass.—2. In biol., the internal or inferior layer of cells of the embryo of metazoic animals, forming the endoderm or innermost membrane: the opposite of epiblast: correlated with mesoblast. From the hypoblast is ultimately developed the lining of the enteric cavity, or the superficial layer of cells of the alimentary canal and its annexes. Also endoblast. Foster and Balfour.

hypoblastic (hi'pō-blāst'ik), a. [< hypoblast + -ic.] Pertaining to a hypoblast; developed in or from a hypoblast; endodermal: as, hypoblastic cells.

hypobole (hi-pōb'ō-lē), n. [< Gr. ὑποβολή, a throwing under, a suggesting, reminding, < ὑποβάλλω, throw under, < ὑπό, under, + βάλλω, throw. Cf. hyperbole.] In rhet., a figure in which several things are mentioned that seem to make against the argument or in favor of the opposite side, but each of which is refuted in order.

Hypobranchia (hi-pō-brang'ki-ā), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. ὑπό, under, + βράγχια, gills.] In zool., same as Inferobranchiata, 2.

hypobranchial (hi-pō-brang'ki-āl), a. and n. [< Gr. ὑπό, under, + βράγχια, gills.] I. a. Situated below the gills, or beneath the branchial apparatus in general.—Hypobranchial groove, in ascidians, the endostyle.

II. n. The internal piece of the inferior part of the branchial arch in fishes.

Hypobranchiata (hi-pō-brang'ki-ā'tā), n. pl. [NL., as Hypobranchia + -ata.] Same as Inferobranchiata, 2.

hypobranchiate (hi-pō-brang'ki-āt), a. Pertaining to or having the characters of the Hypobranchia; inferobranchiate.

hypobromite (hi-pō-brō'mit), n. [< hypobromous + -ite.] A salt of hypobromous acid.

hypobromous (hi-pō-brō'mus), a. [< Gr. ὑπό, under, + Ε. brom(ine) + -ous.] Used only in the following phrase:—Hypobromous acid, HBrO, an acid known only in its aqueous solution, which is a light-yellow liquid having a strong oxidizing action and a bleaching effect.

hypocarpogean (hi-pō-kār-pō-jē'an), a. [< Gr. ὑπό, under, + καρπός, fruit, + γῆ, the earth.] Same as hypogaeal. [Rare.]

hypocastanum (hi-pō-kas'tā-num), n. [< Gr. ὑπό, under, + κάστανος, chestnuts: see Castanea, chesten.] A brown lake prepared from the horse-chestnut; chestnut-brown.

hypocatharsis (hi'pō-ka-thār'sis), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑποκαθάρσις, in lit. sense a purging downward, < ὑποκαταίρω, purge downward: see catharsis.] In pathol., a slight purging.

hypocaust (hip'ō-kāst), n. [< L. hypocaustum, hypocauston, < Gr. ὑποκαυστον, a vaulted room heated by a furnace below, < ὑποκαίω, burn or heat from below, < ὑπό, under, below, + καίω, burn, > καυστός, verbal adj.: see caustic.] In arch., an arched fire-chamber, from which heat is distributed through earthenware pipes to the rooms above it. The term is also sometimes applied to a fireplace, furnace, or oven.

The stove, or stove, of a German inn derived its name from the great hypocaust, which is always strongly heated to secure the warmth of the apartment in which it is placed.

Scott, Anne of Geierstein, xix.

In the rear were the reservoirs to contain the requisite supply of water, and below them the hypocaust or furnace, by which it (the baths of Caracalla) was warmed with a degree of scientific skill we hardly give the Romans of that age credit for. J. Ferguson, Hist. Arch., I. 332.

Hypocephalidæ (hi'pō-se-fal'i-dē), n. pl. [NL. (Le Conte, 1876), < Hypocephalus + -idæ.] A peculiar and anomalous family of Coleoptera, represented by the genus Hypocephalus.

Hypocephalus (hi'pō-sef-a-lus), n. [NL. (Desmarest, 1832), < Gr. ὑπό, under, + κεφαλή, head.] An aberrant genus of beetles, the type of the family Hypocephalidæ, represented by one species, H. armatus of Brazil. This beetle is nearly 3 inches long, and of strange form, having an enormous prothorax and curiously curved spiny legs. The position of the genus has been much disputed; Burmeister and others place it with the prionine group of cerambycids, while Le Conte considers it to be allied to the rhyncophorous series.

hypochil (hip'ō-kil), n. Same as hypochilium. hypochilium (hi-pō-kil'i-um), n.; pl. hypochilia (-ā). [NL., < Gr. ὑπό, under, + χεῖλος, the lip.] In bot., the lower part of the labellum or lip of certain orchids.

hypochlorite (hi-pō-klō'rit), n. [< hypochlorous + -ite.] In chem., a salt of hypochlorous acid. The hypochlorites are usually prepared by leading chlorine gas into a solution of an alkali hydrate, or over solid calcium hydrate. Calcium hypochlorite is the chief constituent of bleaching-powder.

hypochlorous (hi-pō-klō'rūs), a. [< hypo- + chlorous.] In chem., applied to an acid (HClO) having marked bleaching properties, obtained in solution by distilling bleaching-powder with dilute nitric acid. It is the active principle of bleaching-powder.

Hypocherideæ (hi-pō-kē-rid'ē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Bentham and Hooker, 1876), < Hypochæris (-id-) + -eæ.] A subtribe of composite plants, typified by the genus Hypochæris. They are annual or perennial herbs with radical leaves, scapiform stems, the bracts of the involucre in many imbricated series, more or less contracted achenia, and plumose or simple pappus.

Hypochoeris (hî-pô-kê'ris), n. [Gr. ὑποχώρα, a plant of the succory kind, appar. (?) < ὑπό, under, + χώρα, a pig.] A genus of yellow-flowered herbs, of the natural order Compositae, of the tribe Cichoriaceae, and type of the subtribe Hypochoerideae. About 30 species are known, distributed over temperate portions of the world. H. radicata of Europe, also sparingly introduced into the United States, is the cat's ear.

hypochondr (hip'ô-kon'), n. An abbreviation of hypochondriac. [Davies.] [Rare.]

You have droop'd within a few years into such a dispirited condition that 'tis as much as a plentiful dose of the best canary can do to remove the hypochondr for a few minutes.

Tom Brown, Works, II. 233.

hypochondr (hî-pô-kon'dér), n. [Gr. ὑποχόνδριον, q. v.] Same as hypochondriac.

hypochondria (hî-pô- or hip'ô-kon'dri-ä), n. [= F. hypochondria = Sp. hypochondria = Pg. hypochondria = It. ipocondria = G. hypochondria = Dan. Sw. hypochondri, < ML. hypochondria, fem. sing., the morbid condition so called, supposed to have its seat in the upper part of the abdomen, < NL. hypochondrium.] A morbid condition characterized by exaggerated uneasiness and anxiety as to one's health, and also by extreme general depression; low spirits: in this sense often abbreviated hypo, or formerly hyp, hip. See hypol, hip. Hypochondria, real or affected, was formerly also called spleen, vapors, and other vague names. Also hypochondriacism, hypochondriasis, hypochondriasm.

hypochondria, n. Plural of hypochondrium.

hypochondriac (hî-pô- or hip'ô-kon'dri-ak), a. and n. [F. hypochondriaque = Sp. ipocondriaco = Pg. hypochondriaco = It. ipocondriaco (cf. D. G. hypochondriach = Dan. Sw. hypokondrisk) (see hypochondria), < NL. hypochondriacus, < Gr. ὑποχονδριακός, affected in the hypochondrium, < ὑποχόνδριον: see hypochondrium.] I. a. 1. In anat.: (a) Situated below the cartilages of the ribs—that is, under the "short ribs": specifically applied in human anatomy to the region of either hypochondrium. See third cut under abdominal. (b) Same as hypochondrial.—2. In entom., of or pertaining to the hypochondria, or basal ventral plates of the abdomen: as, the hypochondriac segment.—3. In pathol., suffering from hypochondria; morbidly anxious about one's health, and affected with general depression of spirits; also, characteristic of or produced by hypochondria.

Democritus, that thought to laugh the times into goodness, seems to me as deeply hypochondriac as Heraclitus that bewailed them. Sir P. Browne, Religio Medici, ii. 4.

Seized with an hypochondria alarm at every new sensation.

Macaulay, Milford's Hist. Greece.

There was a pleasurable illumination in your eye occasionally, a soft excitement in your aspect, which told of no bitter, bilious, hypochondria brooding.

Charlotte Brontë, Jane Eyre, xxvii.

II. n. A person affected with hypochondria; one who is morbidly anxious about his health, and generally depressed.

Terror has frequently excited languid hypochondriacs to exertions they had deemed impossible.

T. Cogan, On the Passions, I. ii. 3.

These hypochondriacs are the torments of their physicians, and think they are insulted if their complaints are called imaginary.

J. F. Clarke, Self-Culture, p. 97.

hypochondriacal (hî-pô- or hip'ô-kon'dri-ak-al), a. [Gr. ὑποχονδριακός, < ὑπό, under, + χώρα, a pig.] Same as hypochondriac, 3.

hypochondriacally (hî-pô- or hip'ô-kon'dri-ak-al-i), adv. In a hypochondriac or melancholy manner.

hypochondriacism (hî-pô- or hip'ô-kon'dri-ä-sizm), n. [Gr. ὑποχονδριακός + -ism.] Same as hypochondria.

hypochondrial (hî-pô-kon'dri-ä-l), a. [Gr. ὑποχονδριακός + -al.] Situated upon the flanks: as, hypochondrial feathers. Also hypochondriac. Macgillivray.

hypochondriasis (hî-pô- or hip'ô-kon'dri-ä-sis), n. [NL., a more correct term for hypochondria; < hypochondrium + -iasis.] Same as hypochondria.

hypochondriasm (hî-pô- or hip'ô-kon'dri-ä-izm), n. [Gr. ὑποχονδριακός + -asm.] Same as hypochondria.

hypochondriast (hî-pô- or hip'ô-kon'dri-äst), n. [Gr. ὑποχονδριακός + -ast.] One afflicted with hypochondria; a hypochondriac.

hypochondriat (hî-pô-kon'dri-ät), n. Same as hypochondry.

hypochondrium (hî-pô-kon'dri-um), n.; pl. hypochondria (-ä). [NL. (formerly Englished hypochondry, pl. hypochondries, and hypochonder, < F. hypochondre, < L. hypochondrium (in pl.), < Gr. ὑποχόνδριον, pl. ὑποχόνδρια, the soft part of the body below the cartilage and above the navel, < ὑπό, under, + χόνδρος, a corn, grain, gristle, cartilage, esp. of the breast-bone: see chondr. Hence hypochondria, q. v.] 1. In anat.: (a) In human anat., a superior and lateral part of the abdomen, beneath the lower ribs; one of the specific regions of the abdomen, situated on either side of the epigastrium, above the lumbar regions. See abdominal regions, under abdominal. (b) Some abdominal region corresponding to the above, as the flank or side of the rump of a bird; an iliac region.—2. pl. In entom., two lateral pieces at the base of the abdomen beneath, behind the metasternum and posterior coxæ: so called by Kirby. They are found in many Coleoptera, etc., and are really parts of the first ventral segment, which is hidden in the middle.

hypochondry (hî-pô-kon'dri), n. Same as hypochondrium.

If from the liver, there is usually a pain in the right hypochondria. If from the spleen, hardness and grief in the left hypochondria, a rumbling, much appetite, and small digestion.

Burton, Anat. of Mel., p. 200.

hypocist (hî-pô-sist), n. [NL. hypocistis, < L. hypocistis, < Gr. ὑποκίστις, impropr. ὑποκίστις, a parasitic plant which grows on the roots of the cistus, < ὑπό, under, below, + κίστος, cistus.] An inspissated juice obtained from a plant, the Cytinus hypocistis, natural order Cytinaceae. The juice is expressed from the unripe fruit, evaporated to the consistence of an extract, formed into cakes, and dried in the sun. It is an astringent, useful in diarrheas and hemorrhages.

hypoclidia, n. Plural of hypoclidium.

hypoclidian (hî-pô-klî'di-an), a. Of or pertaining to the hypoclidium: as, a hypoclidian process. Also hypocleidian.

hypoclidium (hî-pô-klî'di-um), n.; pl. hypoclidia (-ä). [NL., < Gr. ὑπό, under, + κλεις (kleid-), a key, the clavicle.] In ornith., the interclavicular element of the clavicles of a bird; an interferomedial process of the united clavicles. It is well shown in the common fowl, where the hypoclidium is the thin flat rounded bit of bone at the junction of the legs of the merrythought or wishbone. See cut under furcula. Also hypocleidium.

hypocoracoid (hî-pô-kor'ä-koid), n. [Gr. ὑπό, under, + E. coracoid.] In ichth., the lower one of two bones which bear the actinosts or base of the pectoral fin in most fishes. It was considered to be homologous with the cubital by Cuvier, with the radius by Owen, and with the coracoid by later ichthyologists.

hypocoristic (hî-pô-kô-ris'tik), a. and n. In Gr. and Lat. gram., same as diminutive.

hypocotyl (hî-pô-kot-il), n. [Short for hypocotyledonous stem.] In bot., that part of the axis which is below the cotyledons. Also called the caulicle, and erroneously the radicle.

With seedlings the stem which supports the cotyledons (i. e. the organs which represent the first leaves) has been called by many botanists the "hypocotyledonous stem," but for brevity's sake we will speak of it merely as the hypocotyl.

Darwin, Movement in Plants, Int., p. 5.

hypocotyledonary (hî-pô-kot-i-lê'don-ä-ri), a. [Gr. ὑπό, under, + κοτυληδών, cotyledon, + -ary.] Pertaining to or resembling the hypocotyl or hypocotyledonous stem.

Water-plants; seed with little or no endosperm, but a strongly developed hypocotyledonary axis to the embryo.

Sachs, Botany (trans.), p. 553.

hypocotyledonous (hî-pô-kot-i-lê'don-us), a. [Gr. ὑπό, under, + κοτυληδών, cotyledon, + -ous.] In bot., situated under or supporting the cotyledons. Darwin. See hypocotyl.

hypocotylous (hî-pô-kot-i-lus), a. [Gr. ὑποκωτὶλ + -ous.] Of or pertaining to the hypocotyl.

Nature.

hypocras, n. A former spelling of hippocras. hypocrater (hî-pô-krä'tér), n. [Gr. ὑποκράτης, the stand of a crater, < ὑπό, under, + κρατήρ, a mixing-vessel: see crater.] In archæol., a stand or foot designed to support a crater or a vase of similar form, particularly an apodal vase. See cut under dinos.

hypocrateriform (hî-pô-krä'ter-i-fôrm), a. [Gr. ὑποκράτης, the stand of a crater (see hypocrater), + L. forma, shape.] In bot., salver-shaped: an epithet applied to a corolla consisting of a straight tube surmounted by a flat and spreading limb, as in the cowslip and phlox.

hypocraterimorphous (hî-pô-krä'ter-i-môr-fus), a. [NL., < Gr. ὑποκράτης, the stand of a crater, + μορφή, form.] Same as hypocrateriform.

hypocrisis (hî-pô-krî-sis), n.; pl. hypocrisies (-siz). [ME. hypocrisie, ypocrisie, etc., < OF. ypocrisie, ypocrisie = Pr. ypocrisia = Sp. hipocresia = Pg. ypocrisia = It. ypocrisia, < LL. ypocrisis, ypocrisis, also an imitation of a person's speech and gestures, < Gr. ὑπόκρισις, a reply, an orator's delivery, ypocrisis, < ὑποκρίσθαι, answer, play a part, < ὑπό, under, + κρίσθαι, contend, dispute: see crisis, critic.] Dissimulation of one's real character or belief; especially, a false assumption of piety or virtue; a feigning to be better than one is; the action or character of a hypocrite.

In fraytout thei faren best of all the foure orders, And [vsen] ypocrisie in all that they werchen.

Piers Plowman's Crede (E. F. T. S.), i. 134.

Beware ye of the leaven of the Pharisees, which is ypocrisie.

Luke xii. 1.

Next stood Hypocrisy, with holy leer, Soft smiling and demurely looking down, But hid the dagger underneath the gown.

Dryden, Pal. and Arc., ii. 564.

This then is hypocrisy—not simply for a man to deceive others, knowing all the while that he is deceiving them, but to deceive himself and others at the same time.

J. H. Newman, Parochial Sermons, i. 127.

=Syn. Pretense, cant, formalism, sanctimoniousness, Pharisism. See dissemble, dissembler, and deceit.

hypocrite (hip'ô-krit), n. [ME. hypocrite, ypocrite, < OF. hypocrite, F. hypocrite = Pr. ypocrita = Sp. hipocrita = Pg. ypocrita = It. ipocondria, ipocrizio, < LL. ypocrita, a hypocrite; L., a mimic who accompanied the delivery of an actor by gestures; < Gr. ὑποκρίτης, one who answers, a player, also a pretender, ypocrite, < ὑποκρίσθαι, answer, play a part: see hypocrisy.] One who assumes a false appearance; one who feigns to be what he is not, or to feel or believe what he does not actually feel or believe; especially, a false pretender to virtue or piety.

Woe unto you, scribes and Pharisees, ypocrites! for ye are like unto whited sepulchres, which indeed appear beautiful outward, but are within full of dead men's bones, and of all uncleanness.

Mat. xxiii. 27.

The fawning, sneaking, and flattering hypocrite, that will do or be any thing for his own advantage, is despised by those he courts, hated by good men, and at last tormented by his own conscience.

Stillingsfleet, Sermons, II. i.

=Syn. Dissembler, Ypocrite (see dissembler); Pharisee, formalist, cheat.

hypocritely (hip'ô-krit-li), adv. Hypocritically.

He is re-hardned: like a stubborn Boy That plies his Lesson, Hypocritely coy.

Sylvester, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, ii., The Lawe.

hypocritical (hip'ô-krit'ik), a. [Gr. ὑποκριτικός, acting a part, < ὑποκρίτης: see hypocrite.] Hypocritical. [Rare.]

hypocritically (hip'ô-krit'ik-al), a. [Gr. ὑποκριτικῶς, acting a part, < ὑποκρίτης: see hypocrite.] Hypocritically. [Rare.]

Indeed it is an easie matter for any to make a slight formal profession, to run in a round of hypocritical duties, and live a moral civil life.

Hopkins, Works, p. 733.

Make thy choice whether still to be subtle, worldly, selfish, iron-hearted, and hypocritical, or to tear these sins out of thy nature, though they bring the life-blood with them!

Hawthorne, Seven Gables, xviii.

=Syn. Dissembling, insincere, hollow, sham; sanctimonious, canting, pharisaical.

hypocritically (hip'ô-krit'ik-al-i), adv. In a hypocritical manner; with hypocrisy; without sincerity.

Simeon and Levi spake not only falsely, but insidiously, nay hypocritically.

Government of the Tongue.

hypocritish (hip'ô-krit-ish), a. [Gr. ὑποκριτής + -ish.] Hypocritical.

The Lord . . . hath gathered him a flock, to whom he hath given ears to hear that the hypocritish wolves cannot hear.

Tyndale, Ana. to Sir T. More, etc. (Parker Soc., 1850), p. 49.

hypocycloid (hî-pô-sî'kloid), n. [Gr. ὑπό, under, + E. cycloid.] In geom., a curve described by a point on the circumference of a circle which rolls upon the inside of another circle.

hypodactylum (hî-pô-dak'ti-lum), n.; pl. hypodactylia (-liä). [NL., < Gr. ὑπό, under, + δάκτυλος, finger, toe.] In ornith., the under side of the toe of a bird: opposed to acrodactylum. [Rare.]

hypoderm (hî-pô-dér-m), n. [NL. hypoderma.] 1. In bot., same as hypoderma, 1.—2. In arthropods, an epithelial integumentary layer below the cuticular or chitinated crust.

hypoderma (hî-pô-dér-mä), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑπό, under, + δέρμα (-r), skin.] 1. In bot., the layer of colorless cells just beneath the epidermis of a leaf; also extended to the external cortex under the epidermis of a stem: introduced in the first sense by Kraus (1865). It is most commonly collenchyma. Also hypoderm.—2. [cap.] A genus of hypodermic dipterous insects, or botflies, of the family Estridae, species of which live under the skin of various ruminant and other hoofed quadrupeds. H. bovis is the bot-fly of the ox. A related species, H. linearis, is known in Texas as the heel-fly, from attacking the heels of cattle. Clark, 1815.—3. [cap.] A genus of chiropterous mammals, or bats. Geoffroy, 1829.

hypodermal (hi-pō-dēr'māl), a. and n. [As hypodermic + -al.] I. a. Same as hypodermic. [Rare.]

II. n. In sponges, a hypodermale.

hypodermale (hi-pō-dēr-māl'e), n.; pl. hypodermalia (-li-ā). [NL.: see hypodermic.] A pentact sponge-spicule of the outer surface, with immersed radial ray only. F. E. Schulze.

hypodermatic (hi-pō-dēr-mat'ik), a. and n. [As hypodermic + -atic.] I. a. Same as hypodermic. [Rare.]

I should resort to hypodermatic injections.
Buck's Handbook of Med. Sciences, V. 11.

II. n. A hypodermic injection.

I again administered the hypodermatic of morphia.
Medical News, LII, 293.

hypodermatically (hi-pō-dēr-mat'ik-ā-lī), adv. Hypodermically.

It is, moreover, impossible to use the bichloride hypodermatically about the legs without producing abscesses.
Medical News, LII, 273.

Hypodermiæ (hi-pō-dēr'mi-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Fries), < Gr. ὕδωρ, under, + δέρμα, the skin.] A division of fungi, propagated, so far as known, only by asexual spores, and growing under and through the epidermis of living plants. By Fries it was called an order, including the Ustilaginæ and Uredinæ as suborders. De Bary (1861) made it one of the four groups into which he divided the fungi, without altering its application. In Cohn's system of classification (1872) it was made a section of the order Basidiomycetes, still including, however, the Ustilaginæ and Uredinæ. The studies of De Bary and others have thrown much additional light upon the life-history of these forms, with the result of showing that the two groups are not very closely related. Consequently, by later systematists the Uredinæ have been raised to the rank of a class coordinate with the Basidiomycetes, and the Ustilaginæ included as an order in the class Zygomycetes, the division Hypodermiæ being abandoned.

hypodermic (hi-pō-dēr'mik), a. and n. [< Gr. ὕδωρ, under, + δέρμα, the skin (cf. hypoderm), + -ic.] I. a. 1. Pertaining or relating to parts under the skin; subcutaneous; employed in introducing foreign substances under the skin; specifically applied to a mode of administering medicines by introducing them under the skin: as, a hypodermic syringe.

The galvanic excitation of the lower limb, or the hypodermic injection of strychnine into it.
Prize Essays, Conn. Med. Soc., 1868.

2. Burrowing in or under the skin; infesting the integuments: as, a hypodermic insect.—3. Of or pertaining to the hypoderm in arthropods: as, a hypodermic layer; hypodermic cells.

II. n. 1. In med., a remedy introduced under the skin, as morphia or other narcotic agent.—2. A hypodermic injection or syringe.

hypodermical (hi-pō-dēr'mi-kāl), a. Same as hypodermic.

hypodermically (hi-pō-dēr'mi-kāl-i), adv. In a hypodermic manner; under the skin.

hypodermis (hi-pō-dēr'mis), n. [NL., < Gr. υποδερμῖς, lit. underskin, < ὕδωρ, under, + δέρμα, skin.] 1. In annelids, as the earthworm, a thick layer, below the cuticula, of reticulated or nucleated tissue, in the meshes of which is a copious transparent gelatinous substance. It is considered by some as probably representing both the dermis and the epidermis of other animals.—2. In entom., a soft cellular substance or tissue lining the abdominal wall of an insect, within the chitinous investment. The more superficial parts of it represent an ectoderm or epidermis, the deeper portion being a parietal layer of the mesoderm.

hypodermoclysis (hi-pō-dēr-mok'li-sis), n. [NL., < Gr. ὕδωρ, under, + δέρμα, skin, + κλύσις, a drenching by a clyster.] The injection of large quantities of a liquid, as water, under the skin, with a view to replenishing the blood.

hypodiapason (hi-pō-di-ā-pā'zon), n. [< Gr. ὕδωρ, under, + διαπασών, diapason: see diapason.] In early music, the interval of an octave when measured downward; a suboctave.

hypodiapente (hi-pō-di-ā-pen'tē), n. [< Gr. ὕδωρ, under, + διαπεντε, diapente: see diapente.] In early music, the interval of a perfect fifth when measured downward.

hypodiatole (hi-pō-di-ās'tō-lē), n. [NL., < Gr. υποδιαστολή, a slight stop, a mark to divide the syllables of a word, < ὑπό, under, + διαστολή, a separation: see diastole.] In Gr. gram., same as diastole, 3.

hypodiatessaron (hi-pō-di-ā-tes'a-ron), n. [< Gr. ὕδωρ, under, + διατεσσαρόν, diatessaron: see diatessaron.] In early music, the interval of a perfect fourth when measured downward.

hypodiazeuxis (hi-pō-di-ā-zūk'sis), n. [< Gr. ὕδωρ, under, + διαζεύξις, diazeuxis: see diazeuxis.] In early music, the separation of two tetrachords by the interval of a fifth, as between the meson and the diezeugmenon. See tetrachord.

hypodidascali (hi-pō-di-das'kal), n. [< L. hypodidascalus, < Gr. ὑποδιδάσκαλος, an under-teacher, < ὕδωρ, under, + διδάσκαλος, a teacher: see didascali.] An under-teacher. [Rare.]

There is the star of eloquence, under whom I am an hypodidascal—in English, his usher.
Shirley, Love Tricks, iii. 5.

hypoditone (hi-pō-di'tōn), n. [< Gr. ὕδωρ, under, + δίτονον, the major third: see ditone.] In early music, the interval of a major third when measured downward.

hypodorian (hi-pō-dō'ri-an), a. [< hypo + Dorian.] See under mode.

hypodorianic (hi-pō-dō-ri-an'ik), a. [< hypodorian + -ic.] See under mode.

hypogæal, hypogæan, etc. See hypogæal, etc.

Hypogæi (hi-pō-jē'i), n. pl. [NL., pl. of LL. hypogæus, hypogæus, underground: see hypogæal.] A family of gasteromycetous fungi, resembling the truffles in their habit of underground growth.

hypogastria, n. Plural of hypogastrium.

hypogastric (hi-pō-gas'trik), a. [< hypogastrium + -ic.] In anat., situated below the stomach; specifically, of or pertaining to the hypogastrium.

Hypogastric artery, the principal branch of the internal iliac artery of the fetus, passing out of the body at the navel, and along the umbilical cord to the placenta, whence also called umbilical artery. There are a pair of these arteries, right and left. After birth the portion of each which is outside the body is cast off, and that portion within the body which becomes an impervious cord takes part in the formation of the urachus, while a small portion which remains pervious becomes known as the superior vesical artery. See cut under embryo.—Hypogastric lobe of the carapace of a brachyurous crustacean, one of the posterolateral subdivisions of the carapace. See cut under Brachyura.—Hypogastric plexuses, plexuses of sympathetic nerves derived from the aortic plexus.—Hypogastric region, the hypogastrium. See abdominal regions, under abdominal.

hypogastrium (hi-pō-gas'tri-um), n.; pl. hypogastria (-ā). [NL., < Gr. ὑπογάστριον, the lower belly, neut. of ὑπογάστρον, pertaining to the lower part of the belly, abdominal, < ὕδωρ, under, below, + γαστήρ, belly.] In human anat., the lower part of the belly; an abdominal region below the umbilical region and between the right and left iliac or inguinal regions. See abdominal regions, under abdominal.

hypogastrocele (hi-pō-gas'trō-sē), n. [< Gr. ὑπογάστρον, the lower belly, + κῆλη, a tumor.] In pathol., a hernia through the walls of the lower belly.

hypogæa, n. Plural of hypogæum.

hypogæal, hypogæal (hi-pō-jē'āl), a. [< LL. hypogæus, hypogæus, < Gr. ὑπόγειος, later Attic ὑπόγαιος, under the earth, underground, subterranean, < ὕδωρ, under, + γῆ, gaia, the earth, the ground.] Subterranean; underground; in bot., growing beneath the surface of the earth, as parts of plants, or in a few instances entire plants, as the truffle and the tuckahoe. Also hypogæus, hypogæous, hypogæan, hypogæan.

This Roman site . . . is certain to reveal a rich hypogæal harvest if it be systematically approached.
Athenæum, No. 3067, p. 182.

hypogæan, hypogæan (hi-pō-jē'an), a. [As hypogæal + -an.] Same as hypogæal.

In any hypogæan insect which continually uses its claws in burrowing, the need of shedding and renewal of those organs is apparent.
Science, V. 519.

hypogæe (hi-pō-jē), n. [< L. hypogæum: see hypogæal.] Same as hypogæum.

The earlier accounts of the painted hypogæes of Etruria.
C. O. Müller, Manual of Archaeol. (trans.), § 177.

hypogeiodyti (hi-pō-jē'ō-di), n. [< Gr. ὑπόγειος, underground (see hypogæal), + δύσις, way.] The art of laying out mines and tunnels and of mapping caves; subterranean surveying. See, Pref. to Euclid (1570).

hypogene (hi-pō-jēn), a. [< Gr. ὕδωρ, under, + γενής, -produced: see -gen.] Produced or formed under or below (the earth's surface); neither formed; specifically, in geol., said of rocks which have assumed their present form and structure beneath the surface; Plutonic: a term applied more especially to the granitic rocks: opposed to epigene.

I proposed in the Principles of Geology the term "hypogene," . . . a word implying the theory that granite, gneiss, and the other crystalline formations are alike neither formed rocks, or rocks which have not assumed their present form and structure on the surface.
Lyell, Elem. of Geology (ed. 1865), p. 9.

Hypogene or Plutonic action. The changes within the earth caused by original internal heat and by chemical action.
A. Geikie, Geology (2d ed.), p. 178.

hypogenous (hi-pō-jē'n-us), a. [< Gr. ὕδωρ, under, + γενής, -produced (cf. hypogene), + -ous.] 1. Produced below or upon the under surface: applied to fungi growing upon the under side of leaves: distinguished from epigenous and epiphyllous. Also hypophyllous.—2. Growing beneath the surface, as the cephalodia of some lichens. Also hypomenous.

hypogeous, hypogæous (hi-pō-jē'us), a. [< LL. hypogæus, underground: see hypogæal.] Same as hypogæal.

hypogæum, hypogæum (hi-pō-jē'um), n.; pl. hypogæa, hypogæa (-ā). [NL., < Gr. ὑπόγειον, ὑπόγειον, an underground chamber, neut. of ὑπόγειος, ὑπόγαιος, underground: see hypogæal.] In arch.,

Hypogæum.—Tomb of Khnumhotep, at Beni Hassan, Egypt, showing the so-called proto-Doric columns.

that part of a building which is below the level of the ground, including cellars, vaults, etc.; also, any underground construction, chamber, etc., as the syringes of ancient Egypt, or the tombs of the Etruscans. Also hypogee.

The tombs of Beni Hassan . . . are situated on the eastern side of the Nile, and are almost the only hypogæa that are so placed in Egypt. J. Ferguson, Hist. Arch., I. 110.

A series of hypogæa or caves sunk in the solid rock.
Encyc. Brit., II. 395.

hypogousia (hi-pō-jō'si-ā), n. [NL., < Gr. ὕδωρ, under, + γεύσις, the sense of taste, < γεύειν, give to taste: see gust.] Diminution of the sense of taste.

hypoglossal (hi-pō-glos'al), a. and n. [< Gr. ὕδωρ, under, + γλῶσσα, the tongue, + -al. Cf. hypoglossis.] I. a. Situated under the tongue, wholly or in part: specifically applied to a pair of nerves.—Hypoglossal nerve, either of the twelfth or last pair of cranial nerves of most vertebrates. It is the motor nerve of the tongue and associate parts. In man the hypoglossal arises from the medulla oblongata by several filaments, in a line with the anterior roots of the spinal nerves, leaves the cranial cavity by the anterior condyloid foramen, descends the neck deeply to a point opposite the angle of the lower jaw, winds around the origin of the occipital artery, crosses the carotid, and enters the substance of the tongue between the mylohyoid muscle and the hyoglossal. See second cut under brain.

II. n. A hypoglossal nerve. Also hypoglossus.

hypoglossi, n. Plural of hypoglossus.

hypoglossis, hypoglossis (hi-pō-glos'is, -glot'is), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑπογλωσσῖς, ὑπογλωσσῖς, a swelling on the under side of the tongue, the under surface of the tongue, < ὕδωρ, under, + γλῶσσα, γλῶττα, the tongue.] 1. In anat., the under part of the tongue.—2. Anything under the tongue.

(a) In pathol., a sublingual tumor. See ranula. (b) A lozenge or pill to be kept under the tongue till dissolved.

3. In entom., an outer division of the mentum, generally concealed or aborted, but visible in certain Coleoptera.

hypoglossus (hi-pō-glos'us), n.; pl. hypoglossi (-i). [NL., < Gr. ὕδωρ, under, + γλῶσσα, tongue.]

1. In ichth.: (a) A nerve of some fishes, as sharks, formed by the coalescence of the ventral or anterior roots of the last three cranial nerves, and extending to certain muscles of the shoulder-girdle. [cap.] A genus of fishes, containing the halibut: same as Hypoglossus.

Smith, 1833.—2. In anat., same as hypoglossal.

hypoglossitis, n. See hypoglossitis.

hypognathism (hi-pōg'nā-thizm), n. [As hypognathous + -ism.] The quality or condition of being hypognathous. Cowes, 1864.

hypognathous (hi-pōg'nā-thus), a. [< Gr. ὕδωρ, under, + γνάθος, jaw.] In ornith., having the under mandible longer than the upper, as the black skimmer, Rhynchops nigra: applied either to the bird or to its beak. Coues. See cut under Rhynchops.

hypogonation (hî-pô-gô-nat'i-on), n. [Gr. ὑπογονάτιον, a kneeling-cushion, < Gr. ὑπό, under, + γόνυ = E. knee.] Same as epigonation.

hypogyn (hî-pô-jîn), n. [As hypogynous.] A hypogynous plant.

Hypogynæ (hî-pô-jîn-æ), n. pl. [NL. (Sachs): see hypogynous.] A division of gamopetalous plants in which the corolla is hypogynous. It includes the Tubulifloræ with 5 orders, the Labiataefloræ with 11 orders, the Diandrae with 2 orders, and the Corollatae with 5 orders.

hypogynic (hî-pô-jîn'ik), a. [As hypogynous + -ic.] Inserted in a hypogynous manner: said of parts of a flower.

hypogynous (hî-pô-jîn-us), a. [NL. *hypogynus, < Gr. ὑπό, under, + γύνη, female (mod. bot. pistil, ovary).] In bot., situated beneath the pistil: applied to parts which, as in the Ranunculaceæ, are inserted or borne on the receptacle of the flower, which has the sepals, petals, numerous stamens, and many or few pistils, all distinct and unconnected and inserted upon the torus or axis, with the pistils at the summit. — Hypogynous insertion. See insertion.

hypogyny (hî-pô-jîn'i-ni), n. [As hypogynous + -y.] In bot., the condition or state of being hypogynous.

Hypohippus (hî-pô-hip'us), n. [NL., prop. *hyphippus, < Gr. ὑπό, under, + ἵππος, horse.] A genus of extinct perissodactyl ungulate mammals, of the family Anchitheriidae. J. Leidy, 1858.

hypoiastian, hypoiastianic (hî-pô-i-as'ti-an, -an'ik), a. [Gr. ὑποιαστικός, under mode.]

hypoiastian, hypoiastianic (hî-pô-i-ō-ni-an, -an'ik), a. [Gr. ὑποιαστικός, under mode.]

hypojacobian (hî-pô-ja-kô-bi-an), a. [Gr. ὑποιακωβίανος, under mode.] In math., Jacobian: so called in contradistinction to hyperjacobian.

hypokinetic (hî-pô-ki-net'ik), a. [Gr. ὑπό, under, + κινητικός, moving: see kinetic.] Exhibiting less than the normal amount of action.

hypolais (hî-pô-lā'is), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑπολαΐς, some small bird.] 1. In ornith., an old (Aristotelian) name of some small European bird, perhaps a warbler, sylvia, or becafin, made by Aldrovand the same as curruca. Hence—(a) In the form hypolais, the Linnean specific name of the icterine warbler, Motacilla hypolais, the Sylvia hypolais of other writers. (b) [cap.] A genus of small sylvine warblers of Europe, etc., of which the icterine warbler, Hypolais icterina, is the type: synonymous with Asilus, Curruca, Ficedula, etc. J. J. Krehl, 1829; Cabanis, 1850. Also written Hypolais. C. L. Brehm, 1828.

2. [cap.] In entom., a genus of pyralid moths. Gueneé, 1854.

Hypolepidae (hî-pô-le-pid'ē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Fée), < Hypolepis (-id-) + -ae.] A tribe of polypodiaceous ferns, typified by the genus Hypolepis, now referred to the tribe Pteridaceæ.

Hypolepis (hî-pô-lē'p-is), n. [NL. (Bernhardi), < Gr. ὑπό, under, + λείψ, a scale, husk.] A genus of polypodiaceous ferns, of the tribe Pteridaceæ, the type of the old tribe Hypolepidae. The sort are marginal, placed usually in the sinuses of the frond, small, subglobose, uniform, and distinct. The fronds are from twice to four times pinnate, with free veins. About a dozen species are known, widely distributed in tropical countries.

hypolydian (hî-pô-lid'i-an), a. [Gr. ὑπολύδιος, under mode.] See under mode.

Hypolytrææ (hî-pô-lit'rē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Nees, 1834), < Hypolytrum + -ææ.] A tribe of plants of the natural order Cyperaceæ, typified by the genus Hypolytrum.

Hypolytrum (hî-pô-lit'rūm), n. [NL. (Richard, 1805), < Gr. ὑπό, under, + λυτρον, a plant, loose-strife.] A genus of monocotyledonous rush-like plants, of the order Cyperaceæ, the type of the tribe Hypolytrææ. The inflorescence is in fascicle or corymbose roundish panicles, which are many-flowered; there are 2 hypogynous, keeled, and compressed scales, the exterior one being the largest; there is no calyx; and the stamens are 2 or 3 in number. About 25 species are known, widely dispersed in tropical and subtropical countries.

hypomanikion (hî-pô-ma-nik'i-on), n. [Gr. ὑπομανίκιον, also ὑπομάνικον, < Gr. ὑπό, under, + μανίκιον, sleeve: see epimanikion.] Same as epimanikion.

hypomanikon (hî-pô-man'i-kon), n. Same as epimanikion.

hypomenous (hî-pô-mē-nus), a. [Irreg. < Gr. ὑπομένειν, stay behind, remain, < ὑπό, under, + μένειν, remain: see remain.] Same as hypogenous, 2. Lindley.

hypomeral (hî-pô-mē'ral), a. [Gr. ὑπομέρη + -al.] Inferior or lower, as a part of a sponge; or of pertaining to a hypomere.

hypomere (hî-pô-mēr), n. [Gr. ὑπό, under, + μέρος, a part.] That lower part of some sponges which has all three fundamental layers, ectoderm, mesoderm, and endoderm, but develops no flagellated chambers or choanosome: distinguished from spongomere.

The lower half (of a Rhagon), which consists of all three fundamental layers, may be called the hypomere.

Encyc. Brit., XXII. 415.

hypomixolydian (hî-pô-mik-sô-lid'i-an), a. [Gr. ὑπο- + μίξολυδιαν.] See under mode.

hyponastic (hî-pô-nas'tik), a. [As hyponasty + -ic.] Pertaining to or characterized by hyponasty. Darwin.

When the upper surface of the organ [a leaf] is growing the more rapidly the growth is said to be epinastic, when the lower, hyponastic.

Encyc. Brit., XIX. 58.

hyponasty (hî-pô-nas-ti), n. [Gr. ὑπό, under, + νάσσω, close-pressed, solid, < νάσσειν, press close.] In bot., increased growth along the lower surface of an organ or part of a plant, causing the part to bend upward. Compare epinasty.

hyponeuria (hî-pô-nū'ri-ē), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑπό, under, + νεύρον, nerve.] In pathol., morbidly diminished nervous energy. Dunglison.

hyponitrite (hî-pô-ni'trit), n. [Gr. ὑπο- + νίτρον.] A salt of hyponitrous acid.

hyponitrous (hî-pô-ni'trus), a. [Gr. ὑπο- + νίτρον.] Used only in the following name:—Hyponitrous acid, an unstable acid (HNO) which cannot be isolated, but is obtained in combination as a potassium salt by the reduction of potassium nitrate.

hyponoia (hî-pô-noi'ā), n. [Gr. ὑπόνοια, hidden thought, deeper meaning, < ὑπονοεῖν, think secretly, suspect, < ὑπό, under, + νοεῖν, think, < νόος, mind.] In theol., a supposed hidden meaning or double sense underlying the language of the Bible.

hyponome (hî-pô-nōm), n. [Gr. ὑπονομή, an underground passage, < ὑπόνομος, going underground, < ὑπό, under, + νέμειν, dwell in, inhabit.] The ambulatory pipe or so-called fleshy funnel of a cephalopod. A. Hyatt, Science, III. 123.

hypopharyngeal (hî-pô-fa-rin'jē-al), a. and n. [Gr. ὑπό, under, + φάρυγξ, throat (pharynx).] 1. a. 1. Situated beneath the pharynx.—2. Situated at the lower part of the pharynx.—3. In entom., pertaining to the hypopharynx.—4. In ichth., specifically applied to the lower pharyngeal bones: opposed to epipharyngeal. See the extract.

There are (in osseous fishes) usually five pair of branchial arches connected by median ventral ossifications. The posterior pair are single bones, which underlie the floor of the pharynx, bear no branchial filaments, but commonly support teeth, and are called hypopharyngeal bones. Huxley, Anat. Vert., p. 136.

Hypopharyngeal band, in ascidians, a ciliated tract continued backward from the peribranchial band along the middle of the neural surface of the pharynx to or toward the esophageal opening. See cut under Salpa.—Hypopharyngeal fold, either of a pair of longitudinal lamellae on the middle line of the branchial sac or pharyngeal cavity of an ascidian.

II. n. One of the lower pharyngeal bones: generally used in the plural.

hypopharynx (hî-pô-far'ingks), n.; pl. hypopharynges (-fa-rin'jēz). [Gr. ὑπό, under, + φάρυγξ, throat (pharynx).] In entom., a fleshy organ, generally strengthened with chitinous sclerites, projecting from the floor of the mouth at the opening of the pharynx or gullet. It sometimes has a tongue-like prolongation called the lingua, or that name may be given to the whole hypopharynx. See cut under Hymenoptera.

The anterior surface of the lingua and hypopharynx is beset with fine hairs. Huxley, Anat. Invert., p. 363.

hypophet (hî-pô-fet), n. [Gr. ὑποφήτης, a suggester, interpreter, < ὑπό, under, + φάω, speak. Cf. prophet.] An expounder or interpreter. Bunsen. [Rare.]

hypophleodal (hî-pô-flē-ō-dal), a. Same as hypophleodic.

hypophleodic (hî-pô-flē-ō-dik), a. [As hypophleous + -ode + -ic.] In lichenol., living in the periderm of a plant; situated beneath the outer layers of the bark. Compare epiphleodic.

hypophleous (hî-pô-flē-ūs), a. [Gr. ὑπό, under, + φλοιός, bark.] Same as hypophleodic.

hypophora (hî-pô-ō-rā), n. [LL., < Gr. ὑποφορά, a putting under, subjoining, hypophora, < ὑποφέρω, carry away under, put under, subjoin, < ὑπό, under, + φέρω = E. bear.] In rhet., the statement of an opponent's objection or of an argument which might be urged against the speaker's or writer's position. The hypophora is followed by the answer or counter-argument, called the anthypophora. Hypophora and anthypophora frequently take the form of a series of questions and answers. The word hypophora has accordingly been used sometimes as equivalent to epitostis.

hypophosphate (hî-pô-fos'fāt), n. [Gr. ὑποφωσφορός, < ὑπό, under, + φωσφός, phosphorus.] Same as hypophosphite.

hypophosphite (hî-pô-fos'fit), n. [Gr. ὑποφωσφίτης, < ὑπό, under, + φωσφός, phosphorus.] In chem., a salt obtained by the union of hypophosphorous acid with a salifiable base.

hypophosphoric (hî-pô-fos-for'ik), a. Same as hypophosphorous.

hypophosphorous (hî-pô-fos'fō-rus), a. [Gr. ὑπο- + φωσφορός.] In chem., containing less oxygen than phosphorous acid contains.—Hypophosphorous acid, H₂PO₂, an acid formed by decomposing phosphides with water. It may be obtained as a syrupy acid liquid or a white crystalline solid. Its salts are used to some extent as medicine.

hypophrygian (hî-pô-frij'i-an), a. [Gr. ὑποφρυγίος, < ὑπό, under, + φρύγιος, Phrygian.] See under mode.

Hypophthalmia (hî-pô-thaf'tmā), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑπό, under, + ὀφθαλμός, eye.] 1. pl. In Latreille's system of classification (1831), the ninth tribe of crabs of the division Heterochela, having the hind pair of legs very small and either dorsal or abortive.—2. sing. A genus of arachnids. Taczanowsky, 1873.

hypophyge (hî-pô-fij'i-jē), n. [Gr. ὑποφυγή, a refuge (a recess), < ὑποφύειν, flee from under, retire a little, < ὑπό, under, + φύειν, flee.] In arch., a depression of curved profile beneath some feature, as the hollow molding beneath some archaic Doric capitals, as at Pæstum and Selinus; an apophyge; a scotia. See cut under column.

hypophyllium (hî-pô-fil'i-um), n.; pl. hypophyllia (-ā). [NL., < Gr. ὑπό, under, + φύλλον = L. folium, leaf.] In bot., a petiole that has the form of a small sheath, is destitute of laminae, and surrounds the base of certain small branches, having the appearance of leaves, as in asparagus.

hypophyllous (hî-pô-fil'us), a. [Gr. ὑπό, under, + φύλλον = L. folium, leaf, + -ous.] In bot., same as hypogenous, 1.

hypophyses. n. Plural of hypophysis.

hypophysial (hî-pô-fiz'i-al), a. Of or pertaining to the hypophysis. See conario-hypophysial.

hypophysical (hî-pô-fiz'i-ka), a. [Gr. ὑπό, under, + φυσικός, physical.] Inferior to the physical; beneath or below the physical.

All kinds of knowledge were entirely familiar to him [Jesus]: as the narrative expresses it, the physical and the metaphysical, the hyperphysical and (the) hypophysical.

Stowe, Origin of Books of the Bible, p. 229.

hypophysis (hî-pô-fis'i-sis), n.; pl. hypophyses (-sēs). [NL., < Gr. ὑπόφυσις, an undergrowth, a process, < ὑποφύειν, make to grow from below, pass. grow from below, grow up, < ὑπό, under, + φύειν, make to grow, pass. φύεσθαι, grow. Cf. epiphysis.] 1. The pituitary body of the brain, which is lodged in the sella turcica of the sphenoid bone, and attached to the tuber cinereum of the brain by the infundibulum. It occurs in all vertebrates except Amphioxus. It does not appear to be of true nervous tissue, and its function, if any, is unknown. The name is correlated with epiphysis as a name of the conarium. More fully called hypophysis cerebri. See second cut under brain.

2. In bot.: (a) In angiosperms, the layer of cells in the embryo resulting from the successive fission of the penultimate cell of the suspensor, which gives rise to the primary root and root-cap. (b) In mosses, an enlargement of the pedicel at the base of the capsule. Also called, less correctly, apophysis. See cut under Andreea.

hypopial (hî-pô-pi-al), a. [Gr. ὑποπίος, < ὑπό, under, + πίος, pertaining to the hypopus stage of certain acaroids. See hypopus, 2.]

The hypopial period takes the place of that between two ecdyses in the ordinary life-history.

Michael, Jour. Linn. Soc. (1884), XVII. 389.

hypoplastral (hî-pô-plas'tral), a. Of or pertaining to the hypoplastron of a turtle.

hypoplastron (hî-pô-plas'trōn), n.; pl. hypoplastra (-trā). [Gr. ὑπό, under, + NL. plastron, q. v.] The third lateral piece of the plastron of a turtle: applied by Huxley ("Anat. Vert.," p. 174) to what others call hyposternum. See second cut under Chelonina.

hypopodium (hî-pô-pô'di-um), n.; pl. hypopodia (-ā). [NL. (cf. LL. hypopodium, < Gr. ὑποπόδιον, a foot-stove), < Gr. ὑπό, under, + ποῖς (πόδ-) = E. foot.] In bot., the stalk or foot of the carpels. Lindley. [Rare.]

hypopselaphesia (hi-pop-sel-a-fē'si-ā), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑπό, under, + ψηλάφησης, a touching, < ψηλάφω, feel, touch.] In pathol., partial loss of the tactile sense.

hypopterate (hi-pōp'te-rāt), a. [Gr. ὑπόπτερος, winged, < ὑπό, under, + πτερόν, a wing, + -αίη.] In bot., having a wing produced at the base or below. Lindley. [Rare.]

Hypopterygei (hi-pōp'te-rij'ē-i), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. ὑπό, under, + πτερυξ, πτερύγιον, a wing, < πτερόν, a wing.] A family of pleurocarpous or lateral-fruited mosses, with a peculiar arrangement of the leaves, which are placed in two opposite straight rows united on the upper side of the stem, with a third median row of smaller stipuliform leaves on the under side. The cells of the leaves are parenchymatous and equal in all parts.

Hypopterygiaceæ (hi-pōp'te-rij-i-ā'sē-ē), n. pl. [NL., < Hypopterygei + -aceæ.] Same as Hypopterygei.

hypoptila, n. Plural of hypoptilum.

hypoptilar (hi-pōp'ti-lār), a. [Gr. ὑποπτερίτης, pertaining to the hypoptilum; hyporachidian.]

hypoptilum (hi-pōp'ti-lum), n.; pl. hypoptila (-lā). [NL., < Gr. ὑπό, under, + πτερον, feather.] In ornith., the aftershaft or hyporachis of a feather; the whole of the supplementary plume which springs from the stem of the main feather at the junction of calamus and rachis. Hypoptila are usually present in the general plumage of birds, but are wanting in some families, as owls, and are never developed on the remiges or rectrices. They are usually much smaller than the main feather, but in some cases are about as large, when the feather appears to be double, but with a single barrel. See hyporachis and aftershaft, both of which are more frequently used than hypoptilum.

Hypopus (hi'pō-pus), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑπό, under, + πούς = E. foot.] 1. A supposed genus of acaroids. Dugès, 1834. Hence—2. [L. c.] A heteromorphous nymph of certain acaroids, formerly supposed to be a generic type of the acaroids.

The true hypopus is a heteromorphous nymphal form of Tyroglyphus, and possibly of some allied, or other genera. Michael, Jour. Linn. Soc. (1834), XVII. 379.

hypopygia, n. Plural of hypopygium.

hypopygial (hi-pō-pij'i-āl), a. [Gr. ὑποπυγίος, + -αλ.] In entom., situated under the end of the abdomen; specifically, of or pertaining to the hypopygium.—Hypopygial valves, two oval or oblong cleft plates on the lower side of the last abdominal segments, such as are found in many Tenthredinidae.

hypopygium (hi-pō-pij'i-um), n.; pl. hypopygia (-ā). [NL., < Gr. ὑποπύγιον, the rump, < ὑπό, under, + πύγις, the buttocks.] In entom.: (a) The lamellate clasp-like organ at the end of the abdomen of many male dipterous insects, designed to retain the female. In some species it is very large, and turned under the abdomen. (b) The last visible ventral segment of an insect's abdomen, immediately beneath the pygidium, or last dorsal segment. Kirby.

hypopyum, hypopyon (hi-pō'pi-um, -on), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑπόπυον, a kind of ulcer, neut. of ὑπόπυος, tending to supuration, < ὑπό, under, + πύον, pus; see pus, pyemia.] In pathol., an effusion of pus into the anterior chamber of the eye, or that cavity which contains the aqueous humor.

hyporachidian (hi'pō-ra-kid'i-an), a. [Gr. ὑποραχίδης (-id-) + -ιαν.] Pertaining to or having the character of the hyporachis. Also hyporachidian.

hyporachis (hi-pōr'a-kis), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑπόραχης, the hollow above the hip, < ὑπό, under, + ράχης, the spine.] In ornith.: (a) Properly, the aftershaft; the rachis accessoria; the stem or scape of the supplementary feather which grows upon many feathers of most birds.

Structural characters no less important separate the Rheas from the Emus, and apart from their very different physiognomy, the former can be readily recognized by the rounded form of their contour-feathers, which want the hyporachis or after-shaft that in the Emus and Cassowaries is so long as to equal the main shaft. Encyc. Brit., XX. 505.

(b) The whole of such a supplementary feather; a hypoptilum: more frequently but less correctly used in this sense. See hypoptilum and aftershaft. Also written hyporachis.

hyporadii (hi-pō-rā'di-āl), a. [Gr. ὑποραδίου + -αλ.] Of or pertaining to the hyporadii.

hyporadii (hi-pō-rā'di-ā), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. ὑπό, under, + L. radius, q. v.] In ornith., the accessory radii or barbs of a feather. The barbs of the hyporachis or hypoptilum are to the supplementary feather what the radii or barbs are to the main feather; they may bear barbules or hyporadioli, but never hamuli or hooklets.

hyporadioli (hi-pō-rā'di'ō-li), n. pl. [NL., dim. of hyporadii.] The barbules of the hyporadii; the lesser processes borne upon the barbs of a hyporachis or of a hypoptilum.

hyporchem, n. See hyporcheme.

hyporchema (hi-pōr-kē'mā), n.; pl. hyporchemata (-mā-tā). [NL.] Same as hyporcheme.

hyporchematic (hi'pōr-kē-mat'ik), a. [Gr. ὑπορχημικός (-i-) + -αλ.] Consisting in or pertaining to a hyporcheme or hyporchesis; characterizing or employed in hyporchemes; as, a hyporchematic dance; hyporchematic rhythms.—Hyporchematic prosodia, in enc. pros., an episynthetic meter, consisting of an anapestic prosodia and an iambic dimeter catalectic (— — — — — | — — — — —).

hyporcheme, hyporchem (hi'pōr-kēm, -kem), n. [Gr. ὑπόρχημα, < ὑπορχεῖσθαι, dance with or to music, < ὑπό, under, + ρχεῖσθαι, dance.] In Gr. antiq. and pros., a hymn or poem sung by the main body of the chorus, while some of their number accompanied it with mimetic dancing and gesticulation. The hyporcheme, like the psalm, was originally a hymn or song in honor of Apollo, but of a less solemn character than the psalm. This kind of composition is said to have been first developed by Thaletas in the seventh century B. C., and we still possess fragments of hyporchemes by Simonides, Pratinas, Bacchylides, and Pindar.

hyporchesis (hi-pōr-kē'sis), n. [Gr. ὑπόρχησις, a dancing to the hyporcheme: see hyporcheme.] In Gr. antiq., a choric dance with singing, accompanied by some of the chorus with pantomimic action. The poem sung was called a hyporcheme.

hyporhythmic (hi-pō-rith'mik), a. [Gr. ὑπόρρυθμος, subrhythmical, < ὑπό, under, + ῥυθμός, rhythm: see rhythm.] Deficient in rhythm: applied to a heroic hexameter in which the end of a foot coincides throughout with the end of a word. Such a line, having as many diereses as there are feet ending within the line, and no true cesura, loses all rhythmic coherence and continuity. An example is: Spársis | hástis | lōngis | cāmpus | spléndēt ēt | hōrrēt. Ennius.

hyposcenium (hi-pō-sē'ni-um), n.; pl. hyposcenia (-ā). [NL., < Gr. ὑποσκηνίον, the wall under the front of the stage, < ὑπό, under, + σκήνη, the stage: see scene.] In the ancient Greek theater, the low wall beneath the logeion or front part of the stage, which was raised upon it above the orchestra or konistra. This wall was frequently ornamented with sculptured reliefs, as in the Dionysiac theater at Athens, and with columns and other architectural features, as in the theater of Epidaurus. A flight of steps in the middle or on either side afforded communication between the stage and the orchestra.

hyposkeletal (hi-pō-skel'e-tal), a. [Gr. ὑπόσκελετός, skeleton, + -αλ.] In anat., developed, as muscles, below the endoskeleton: opposed to episkeletal. The hyposkeletal muscles are separated from the episkeletal, not only by the endoskeleton of the trunk, . . . but by the ventral branches of the spinal nerves. Huxley, Anat. Vert., p. 44.

hypospadia (hi-pō-spā'di-ā), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑποσπᾶδιος or ὑποσπᾶδισ, one having hypospadias, < ὑπό, under, + σπᾶν, draw.] An arrest of development of the male generative organs, the urethra being more or less extensively open along its under side. Also hypospadias.

hypospadiac (hi-pō-spā'di-ak), a. and n. [Gr. ὑποσπᾶδίας + -ακ.] I. a. Pertaining to or characterized by hypospadias.

II. n. One who is affected by hypospadias.

hyposphenal (hi-pō-sfē'nal), a. [Gr. ὑποσφηνή + -αλ.] Of or pertaining to a hyposphene; characterized by or possessing a hyposphene, as a vertebra; articulated by means of a hyposphene: as, a hyposphenal process, vertebra, or articulation. Also rarely diplosphenal.

hyposphene (hi'pō-sfēn), n. [Gr. ὑπό, under, + σφήν, a wedge.] The median and single wedge-shaped process situated on the neural arch below the postzygapophyses of the vertebrae of certain extinct reptiles of the Permian period: so called by Cope, and later named diplosphene by Marsh. The process projects into the neural canal from the hinder part of the neural arch, and, with a corresponding formation on the fore part of the neural arch of a succeeding vertebra, affords an articulation additional to those made by the zygapophyses proper.

hyposporangium (hi'pō-spō-ran'ji-um), n. [Gr. ὑπό, under, + σπορά, a spore or seed, + αγγεῖον, a vessel.] The indusium growing from beneath the spore-case of a fern. Cooke. Also called indusium inferius.

hypostasis (hi-pōs'tā-sis), n.; pl. hypostases (-sēz). [NL., < Gr. ὑποστάσις, a supporting, foundation, substance, reality, < ὑπὸ, under, substantially existing, lit. set under, < ὑπάρσκει, set under, pass. stand under, < ὑπό, under, + λίσσεται, set set, = L. stare = E. sta-nd.] 1. That which underlies something else; that which forms the basis of something; foundation; support.—2. In theol., a person of the Trinity; one of the three real and distinct subsistences in the one undivided substance or essence of God. The Christian uses of the term hypostasis started from the meaning 'a reality; a real personal subsistence or substance.' In this sense the word could be used of God either as the Trinity or as each person of the Trinity. Accordingly, the meaning of the phrase 'character of his [the Father's] hypostasis,' in Heb. i. 3, has been variously understood, the authorized version translating it 'express image of his person,' and the revised version, 'the very image [margin, the impress] of his substance,' and the general usage of the early church being unsettled down to the time of the Arian controversy. In the Western Church the word persona (persona, πρόσωπον) had come into use in the sense still retained by us, and hypostasis, substance, or subsistence (substantia, υπόστασις) was used as equivalent to 'essence' (οὐσία). The Greeks objected to persona or πρόσωπον (properly, a mask or dramatic character), as conveying the Patripassian or Sabellian idea of a mere difference of manifestation, and πρόσωπον never became thoroughly adopted as a Greek theological term. At Alexandria, in the third and fourth centuries, on the other hand, hypostasis had come to be generally used in the sense of 'person,' while at Antioch in the middle of the fourth century there were two different parties among the orthodox: the Meletians, who used hypostasis in the sense of 'person,' and the Eustathians, who used it as equivalent to 'substance' or 'essence' (οὐσία). At a council in Alexandria, A. D. 362, under St. Athanasius, it was agreed that both parties were equally orthodox, and held the same doctrine under a different terminology, and after this the use of hypostasis in the sense of 'essence' was gradually abandoned.

That two natures . . . could have been concentrated into one hypostasis. Jor. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), I. 759.

Essence denotes that which is common to Father, Son, and Spirit. It denominates the substance, the constitutional being, of the Deity, which is possessed alike and differently by each of the personal distinctions. . . . Hypostasis is a term which was more subtle in its meaning than Essence. It denotes not that which is common to the Three in One, but that which is distinctive of and peculiar to them. Shedd, Hist. Christian Doctrine, I. 304.

3. In metaph., a substantial mode by which the existence of a substantial nature is determined to subsist by itself and be incommunicable; subsistence.—4. A hypothetical substance; a phenomenon or state of things spoken and thought of as if it were a substance.

With death the personal activity of which the soul is the popular hypostasis is put into commission among posterity, and the future life is an immortality by deputy (according to Mr. Harrison's theory). Huxley.

5. Principle: a term applied by the alchemists to mercury, sulphur, and salt, in accordance with their doctrine that these were the three principles of all material bodies.—6. In med.: (a) A sediment, as of the urine; any morbid deposition in the body. (b) An overfullness of blood-vessels caused by a dependent position, as of the veins of the legs (varicose veins), etc.; hypostatic congestion.

Also hypostasy.

hypostasization (hi-pōs'tā-si-zā'shōn), n. Same as hypostatization.

hypostasize (hi-pōs'tā-siz), v. t. [Gr. ὑποστασιάζω + -ize.] Same as hypostatize.

The hypostasizing of cause as will seems to us only a more refined form of the hypostatizing of particular processes or forces of Nature as persons, to which mythology is largely referable. Westminster Rev., CXXV. 223.

hypostasy (hi-pōs'tā-si), n. [Gr. ὑπόστασις, q. v.] Same as hypostasis.

Whereas in that vinyon therest is an ineffable mysterie, the two natures in Christ to haue one subsistence called & termed an hypostasis. Bp. Gardiner, Explication, fol. 117.

hypostatic (hi-pō-stat'ik), a. [Gr. ὑποστατικός, belonging to substance, < ὑπόστασις, substantially existing: see hypostasis.] 1. Relating to hypostasis; constitutive or elementary. The hypostatic principles are salt, sulphur, and mercury. See hypostasis, 5.

Of late, divers learned men, having adopted the three hypostaticall principles, are very inclinable to reduce all qualities or bodies to one or other of those three principles; and particularly assign for the cause of blackness the sooty steam of a dust or torried sulphur. Boyle, Hist. Colours, Experiment xv.

2. In theol., personal, or distinctly personal; pertaining to or constituting a distinct being or substance. See hypostasis, 2.

Christians who . . . opposed the doctrine of a hypostatic Logos, . . . of an independent personal subsistence of the Divine Word. Encyc. Brit., XVI. 719.

3. In med., arising from downward pressure; caused by dependence; as, hypostatic congestion.—Hypostatic union, the union of two natures, the divine and the human, in the one hypostasis or person of Christ.

The personal or hypostatic union of the two natures in Christ. Schaff, Christ and Christianity, p. 80.

hypostatical (hi-pō-stat'i-kal), a. [< hypostat-ic + -al.] Same as hypostatic.

But the word hypostatical is understood only by those . . . that are learned in the Greek tongue, and is properly used . . . of the union of the two natures of Christ in one person.

Hobbes, Aus. to Ep. Bramhall, p. 434.

hypostatically (hi-pō-stat'i-kal-i), adv. In a hypostatic manner; personally; in actual substance.

The only true and eternal God hypostatically joined with his holy humanity.

Jer. Taylor, Liberty of Prophecy, § 20.

hypostatization (hi-pōs'tā-ti-zā'shon), n. [< hypostatize + -ation.] The act of hypostatizing, or the state of being hypostatized. Also hypostatization.

Cousin is correct in pointing out, from the Realistic point of view, that it is one thing to deny the hypostatization of an accident like colour or wisdom, and another thing to deny the foundation in reality of those "true and legitimate universals" which we understand by the terms genera and species.

Encyc. Brit., XXI. 421.

hypostatize (hi-pōs'tā-tīz), v. t.; pret. and pp. hypostatized, ppr. hypostatizing. [< hypostat-ic + -ize.] To attribute substantial existence to; make into or regard as a distinct individual substance or reality. A hypostatized attribute is one which is itself regarded as the subject of attributes or characters; and a hypostatized relation is one treated as having relations to other relations. Also hypostatise, hypostatize.

We then hypostatize the zero; we baptize it with the name of the absolute.

Sir W. Hamilton.

If we can hypostatize the community, and treat it as an individual with admitted but human wants and satisfactions, then, for this Leviathan, the ethical and will correspond to what is called Utilitarianism or Universalistic Hedonism.

W. R. Sorley, Ethics of Naturalism, p. 43.

hyposterna, n. Plural of hyposternum.

hyposternal (hi-pō-stēr'nal), a. 1. Situated or occurring below the sternum; substernal: as, hyposternal pain. —2. Of or pertaining to the hyposternum or hypoplastron: as, the hyposternal scute of a tortoise. See plastron.

hyposternum (hi-pō-stēr'nūm), n.; pl. hyposterna (-nā). [NL., < Gr. ὑπότερον, neut. of ὑπό-στρον, under the breast, < ὑπό, under, + στρον, the breast.] The third lateral piece of the plastron of a turtle: called the hypoplastron by Huxley. See second cut under Chelonina.

hypostigma (hi-pō-stig'mā), n.; pl. hypostigmata (-mā). [Gr., < ὑποστίγμα, a comma, < ὑπό, under, + στίγμα, a point: see stigma.] In paleography, a point like the modern period, used with the value of a comma. Also hypostigme.

hypostoma (hi-pōs'tō-mā), n.; pl. hypostomata (-mā). [NL., < Gr. ὑπόστωμα, under, + στόμα, mouth.] 1. An inferior part or organ of the mouth of arthropods and some other animals. (a) The clypeus of dipterous insects. (b) The broad curved sclerite behind the lamina labialis of myriapods. (c) A median formation below and behind the mouth-parts of some crustaceans, as the Euryptera. Also called metastoma. (d) The labium or under lip of trilobites. (e) The proboscis of hydrozoans. Hyatt. Also hypostome.

2. [cap.] Same as Hypostomus.

Hypostomata (hi-pōs'tō-mā-tā), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. ὑπό, under, + στόμα, mouth.] 1. An order or suborder of fishes, confined to the eastern seas, alone represented by the family Pegasidae, of uncertain position, supposed to be related to the mail-cheeked series of acanthopterygians. Originally written in the French form Hypostomides by Duméril. —2. A group of echinoderms. J. E. Gray, 1840. —3. Infusorians in which the mouth is inferior or ventral. Diesing, 1865.

hypostomatous (hi-pō-stōm'a-tus), a. [As hypostoma (-t) + -ous.] Having the mouth inferior or ventral, as some infusorians.

hypostome (hi-pō-stōm), n. [NL. hypostoma, g. v.] Same as hypostoma, 1.

Hypostomidae (hi-pō-stōm'i-dē), n. pl. [< Hypostomus + -idae.] A family of nematognathous fishes, named from the genus Hypostomus: same as Loricariidae.

hypostomous (hi-pōs'tō-mus), a. [< Gr. ὑπό, under, + στόμα, mouth.] In ichth., having the mouth inferior.

Hypostomus (hi-pōs'tō-mus), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑπό, under, + στόμα, mouth.] A genus of fishes, in which the mouth is inferior and under the snout, typical of the family Hypostomidae. LaCépède, 1803. Also Hypostoma.

hypostrophe (hi-pōs'trō-fē), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑποστροφή, a turning about, recurrence, < ὑποστροφή, turn about, return, < ὑπό, under, + στροφή, turn: see strophe.] 1. In med.: (a) The act of a patient in turning himself. (b) Return of a disease; relapse. —2. In rhet., the use of insertion or parenthesis; return to the subject after parenthesis.

hypostyle (hi-pō-stil), a. and n. [< Gr. ὑποστυλος, resting on pillars set underneath, < ὑπό, under, + στυλος, a pillar: see style.] 1. a. In arch., having the roof supported by pillars: as, the hypostyle hall at Karnak.

We come to a hypostyle hall of great beauty, formed by two ranges of larger columns in the centre, and three rows of smaller ones on each side.

J. Ferguson, Hist. Arch., I. 117.

II. n. In arch., a structure, with or without inclosing walls, the ceiling of which is supported by columns; a covered colonnade; a pillared hall: applied specifically to the manyhyposulphite (hi-pō-sul'fit), n. [< hyposulph-urous + -ite.] A salt of hyposulphurous acid (H₂SO₃). Sodium hyposulphite (hyposulphite of soda) is the commercial name for sodium thiosulphite, a salt of thiosulphurous acid (H₂S₂O₃), which is used by dyers for reducing indigo, and generally in the arts as a reducing or decolorizing agent—notably in photography, as the usual chemical for fixing plates and prints.

Hypostyle Hall of Karnak, Egypt.

columned halls of a type characteristic of ancient Egyptian religious architecture. The cut shows part of the interior of one of the greatest of these halls. An exterior view of a later and smaller example is given under Egyptian.

hyposulphuric (hi-pō-sul'fū-rik), a. [< hyposulphurous + -ic.] Same as hyposulphurous.

hyposulphurous (hi-pō-sul'fēr-us), a. [< hy-po + sulphurous.] Next in a series below sulphurous: used only in the following phrase. —Hyposulphurous acid. (a) An acid, H₂SO₃, differing in composition from sulphurous acid only by having one less oxygen atom in the molecule. (b) A totally distinct acid, H₂S₂O₃, now called thiosulphuric acid. See thiosulphuric.

hyposyllogistic (hi-pō-sil-ē-jis'tik), a. [< hypo + syllogistic.] Concluding necessarily like a syllogism, but not strictly syllogistic.

hyposynaphe (hi-pō-sin'a-fē), n. [< Gr. ὑποσύναψις, < ὑποσύναντες, combine slightly, < ὑπό, under, + σύναντες, join together, combine, < σύν, along with, + αντεν, join.] In early music, the separation of two tetrachords by a tetrachord conjoint with both, as between the hypaton and the synemmenon. See tetrachord.

hypotactic (hi-pō-tak'tik), a. [< Gr. ὑποτακτικός, subordinate, subjoined, < ὑποτάσσειν, place under, subject: see hypotaxis.] Of, pertaining to, or characterized by hypotaxis; depending: as, two temporal clauses in hypotactic construction.

hypotarsal (hi-pō-tār'sal), a. [< hypotarsus + -al.] Pertaining to or having the character of the hypotarsus.

hypotarsus (hi-pō-tār'sus), n.; pl. hypotarsi (-sī). [NL., < Gr. ὑπό, under, + ταρσός, the flat of the foot: see tarsus.] In ornith., the talus or so-called calcaneum; a bony process or ossification at the superior and posterior part of the main tarsometatarsal bone, supposed to answer to distal tarsal elements of the reptilian or mammalian foot. It is usually a prominent feature of the upper end and plantar aspect of a bird's tarsus, and is perforated by canals for the passage of tendons of flexor muscles of the toes. See cut under tarsometatarsus.

hypotaxis (hi-pō-tak'sis), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑπόταξις, subjection, submission, < ὑποτάσσειν, place under, subject, < ὑπό, under, + τάσσειν, arrange.] In gram., dependent construction: opposed to parataxis.

Now to make hypotaxis out of parataxis, we must have a joint.

B. L. Gildersleeve, Jour. Philol., XVI. 420.

hypotenusal, hypothenusal (hi-pot-, hi-poth-e-nū'sal), a. [< hypotenuse, hypothenuse, + -al.] Pertaining to a hypotenuse; of the nature of a hypotenuse; forming or formed by a hypotenuse.

Light is incident in such a manner that the angle of internal incidence at the hypotenusal side is nearly equal to the angle of total reflection.

Airy, Optics, prop. xvii.

hypotenuse, hypothenuse (hi-pot-, hi-poth-e-nūs), n. [Prop. hypotenuse, but the erroneous form hypothenuse is more common; < F. hypotenuse = Sp. hipotenusa = Pg. hipotenusa = It. ipotenusa, < LL. hypotenusa, < Gr. ὑποτείνουσα, or in full ἡ τῆς ὀρθῆς γωνίας ὑποτείνουσα, πλευρά, the side subtending the right angle, ppr. fem. of ὑποτείνων, stretch under, sub tend, < ὑπό (= L. sub), under, + τείνων (= L. tendere), stretch: see tend, tone.] In geom., the side of a right-angled triangle opposite the right angle.

hypothalli, n. Plural of hypothallus.

hypothalline (hi-pō-thal'in), a. [< hypothallus + -ine.] Resembling or pertaining to the hypothallus.

hypothallus (hi-pō-thal'us), n.; pl. hypothalli (-ī). [NL., < Gr. ὑπό, under, + θαλλός, a young shoot or branch, a frond.] In lichens, a mass of delicate filaments upon which a thallus is first developed. It is a horizontal stratum, which is developed immediately upon the prothallus, and consists of interlacing filaments or of elongated rounded cellules. It is sometimes of a white or whitish color, but is usually dark or blackish. A secondary form consists of vertical rhizoid fibrils, which are usually branching and tufted at the extremities.

hypothee (hi-poth'ek), n. [= D. hypotheek = G. Dan. hypothek = Sw. hypotek, < F. hypothèque = Pr. hypoteca, ypoteca = Sp. hipoteca = Pg. hipoteca = It. ipoteca, < LL. hypoteca, < Gr. ὑπόθεσις, a pledge, deposit, mortgage, < ὑποθέβαι, place under: see hypothesis and theca.] 1. Same as hypotheation, 1.

Possession, Usucaption, Bonitarian ownership, and Hypothee occupy together a prodigious space in the Roman jurisprudence.

Maine, Early Law and Custom, p. 357.

2. In Scots law, a legal lien given to a creditor upon property, to secure the payment of his demand. It usually if not always implies that possession remains with the debtor, so that the creditor has only a right of action. In case of vessels it may be created by agreement. Tacit or legal hypothee exists by implication of law, as in the case of a landlord's lien on crops for rent, and the lien of an attorney or law agent for costs. The term is also applied in a general sense to the preference over other debts against an estate given by law to some demands, such as funeral expenses, wages, etc.

hypotheary (hi-poth'ē-kā-ri), a. [< LL. hypothecarius, < hypothea, a pledge: see hypothec.] Of or pertaining to hypotheation or mortgage: as, a hypotheary note (that is, a note given in acknowledgment of a debt, but which cannot pass into circulation). Also hypotheatary. —Hypotheary action, in civil law, an action to enforce a hypotheation of property by its sale, and the application of the proceeds to pay the debt. —Hypotheary debt. See debt.

hypotheate (hi-poth'ē-kāt), v. t.; pret. and pp. hypotheated, ppr. hypotheating. [< ML. hypothecatus, pp. of hypothecare, hypotheate, < LL. hypoteca, a pledge: see hypothe.] 1. To pledge to a creditor in security for some debt or demand, but without giving the creditor corporeal control; mortgage, leaving the owner in possession. —2. To put in pledge by delivery, as stocks or effects of any kind, as security for a debt or other obligation.

hypotheation (hi-poth'ē-kā'shon), n. [< ML. hypothecatio(n), < hypothecare, hypotheate: see hypotheate.] 1. In Rom. law, mortgage; a contract lien given by a debtor to his creditor as security, without giving him possession of the property. It usually if not always related to real property, while security upon personal property was given by possession, and termed pignus, or pledge.

The Athenian ἀποθήκη, or hypotheations, were open and notorious like our old feoffments.

Sir W. Jones, A Commentary on Isæus.

2. In French law (hypothèque), a lien on immovable property for security of a debt, without giving the creditor possession. Legal hypotheation is that which is implied by law; judicial hypotheation, that which is established by a judgment of a court, affecting particular real property or all the real property of a particular debtor; and conventional hypotheation, that which is created by contract before a magistrate or notary. Immobilized shares in the Bank of France are deemed immovable property for the purpose of allowing hypotheation. Vessels may be the subject of conventional hypotheation.

3. In American financial usage, a pledge; a lien on personal property, particularly on negotiable securities, given by a debtor by transferring possession, with evidences of title, to his creditor. In this use the term always implies creation by contract, and that the securities hypothecated are put or supposed to be put under the control of the debtor until payment of his debt.

I would give
My laurels, living and to live,
Or as much cash as you could raise on Their value by hypothecation.
Halleck, The Recorder.

4. In modern commercial usage, the mortgage of a vessel or her cargo, as in the phrase hypothecation bond, a bottomry bond or respondentia bond. See bottomry and respondentia.

hypothecator (hi-poth'-ē-kā-tor), n. [hypothecate + -or.] One who pledges anything as security.

hypothecatory (hi-poth'-ē-kā-tō-ri), a. [hypothecate + -ory.] Same as hypothecary.

hypothetical (hi-pō-thē'ti-āl), a. [hypothecium + -al.] Pertaining to the hypothecium.

hypothecium (hi-pō-thē'si-um), n. [NL, < Gr. ὑπόθεσις, under, + θέσις, a case: see thesis.] In bot., the layer, usually dense, of hyphal tissue immediately beneath the hymenium.

hypothek, n. See hypothec.

hypothekar (hi-poth'-ē-nār), n. and a. [NL, < Gr. ὑποθέκων, the part of the palm next the fingers, < ὑπό, under, + θέκων, the palm of the hand.] 1. n. In anat. and zool., the fleshy prominence upon the outer side of the palm of the hand at the base of the little finger. See thenar. Also called hypothekar eminence.

II. a. Pertaining to or situated upon the hypothekar.—Hypothekar muscles, those muscles which collectively act upon the metacarpal bone and the base of the first phalanx of the little finger.

hypothenusal, hypothenusse. See hypotenusal, hypotenuse.

hypothesis (hi-poth'-ē-sis), n.; pl. hypotheses (-sēz). [= D. G. Dan. hypothese = Sw. hypotes = F. hypothèse = Sp. hipótesis = Pg. hipótese = It. ipotesi, < Gr. ὑπόθεσις, a groundwork, foundation, base, supposition, lit. a placing under, that which is placed under, < ὑποτίθειν, place under, < ὑπό, under, + τίθειν, place, put, < τίθεω, a putting; see thesis. Cf. hypothec.] 1. A condition; that from which something follows: as, freedom is the hypothesis of democracy. [Rarely used in English.]—2. A proposition assumed and taken for granted, to be used as a premise in proving something else; a postulate.

Sooner than abandon his theory, there is no extravagance of hypothesis to which the superstitious mind will not resort.
Locky, Europ. Morals, I. 385.

When some hypothesis, absurd and vain,
Has filled with all its fumes a critic's brain.
Couper, Prog. of Err., I. 444.

3. A supposition; a judgment concerning an imaginary state of things, or the imaginary state of things itself concerning whose consequences some statement is made or question is asked; the antecedent of a conditional proposition; the proposition disproved by reductio ad absurdum.

The angles BGH, GHD are equal to two right angles by hypothesis.
Playfair's Euclid, I. 28.

4. The conclusion of an argument from consequent and antecedent; a proposition held to be probably true because its consequences, according to known general principles, are found to be true; the supposition that an object has a certain character, from which it would necessarily follow that it must possess other characters which it is observed to possess. The word has always been applied in this sense to theories of the planetary system. Kepler held the hypothesis that Mars moves in an elliptical orbit with the sun in one focus, describing equal areas in equal times, the ellipse having a certain size, shape, and situation, and the perihelion being reached at a certain epoch. Of the three coordinates of the planet's position, two, determining its apparent position, were directly observed, but the third, its varying distance from the earth, was the subject of hypothesis. The hypothesis of Kepler was adopted because it made the apparent places just what they were observed to be. A hypothesis is of the general nature of an inductive conclusion, but it differs from an induction proper in that it involves no generalization, and in that it affords an explanation of observed facts according to known general principles. The distinction between induction and hypothesis is illustrated by the process of deciphering a despatch written in a secret alphabet. A statistical investigation will show that in English writing, in general, the letter e occurs far more frequently than any other; this general proposition is an induction from the particular cases examined. If now the despatch to be deciphered is found to contain 26 characters or less, one of which occurs much more frequently than any of the others, the probable explanation is that each character stands for a letter, and the most frequent one for e: this is hypothesis. At the outset, this is a hypothesis not only in the present sense, but also in that of being a provisional theory insufficiently supported. As the process of deciphering proceeds, however, the inferences become more and more probable, until practical certainty is attained. Still the nature of the evidence remains the same; the conclusion is held true for the sake of the explanation it affords of observed facts. Generally speaking, the conclusions of hypothetical inference cannot be arrived at inductively, because their truth is not susceptible of direct observation in single cases; nor can the conclusions of inductions, on account of their generality, be reached by hypothetical inference. For instance, any historical fact, such as Napoleon Bonaparte once lived, is a hypothesis; for we believe the proposition because its effects—current tradition, the histories, the monuments, etc.—are observed. No mere generalization of observed facts could ever teach us that Napoleon lived. Again, we inductively infer that every particle of matter gravitates toward every other. Hypothesis might lead to this result for any given pair of particles, but never could show that the law is universal. The chief precautions to be used in adopting hypotheses are two: first, we should take pains not to confine our verifications to certain orders of effects, to which the supposed fact would give rise, but to examine effects of every kind; secondly, before a hypothesis can be regarded as anything more than a suggestion, it must have produced successful predictions. For example, hypotheses concerning the luminiferous ether have had the defect that they would necessitate certain longitudinal oscillations to which nothing in the phenomena corresponds; and consequently these theories ought not to be held as probably true, but only as analogues of the truth. As long as the kinetical theory of gases merely explained the laws of Boyle and Charles, which it was constructed to explain, it had little importance; but when it was shown that diffusion, viscosity, and conductivity in gases were connected and subject to those laws which theory had predicted, the probability of the hypothesis became very great.

I asked him what he thought of Locusts, and whether the History might not be better accounted for, supposing them to be the winged Creatures that fell so thick about the Camp of Israel? but by his answer it appear'd he had never heard of any such Hypothesis.
Maurandrell, Aleppo to Jerusalem, p. 61.

We have explained the phenomena of the heavens and of our sea by the power of gravity. . . . But hitherto I have not been able to discover the cause of those properties of gravity from phenomena, and I frame no hypotheses; for whatever is not deduced from the phenomena is to be called an hypothesis; and hypotheses, whether metaphysical or physical, whether of occult qualities or mechanical, have no place in experimental philosophy.
Newton, Principia (tr. by Motte), iii.

5. An ill-supported theory; a proposition not believed, but whose consequences it is thought desirable to compare with facts.

An hypothesis is any supposition which we make (either without actual evidence, or on evidence avowedly insufficient), in order to endeavor to deduce from it conclusions in accordance with facts which are known to be real; under the idea that if the conclusions to which the hypothesis leads are known truths, the hypothesis either must be, or at least is likely to be true.
J. S. Mill.

Documentary, monophyletic, nebular, etc., hypothesis. See the adjectives.—Hypothesis of degeneration. See degeneration.—Syn. Speculation, etc. See theory.

Hypothesis, v. i. See hypothesize.
hypothesist (hi-poth'-ē-sist), n. [hypothesis (+ -ist).] One who defends a hypothesis.

hypothesize (hi-poth'-ē-siz), v. i.; pret. and pp. hypothesized, ppr. hypothesizing. [hypothesis (+ -ize).] To form hypotheses. Also hypothesize, hypothetize.

One certain proof is, that the Greeks soon lost or entirely neglected it, when they began to hypothesize.
Warburton, Divine Legation, iii. § 4.

We might write and talk and hypothesize, theorize, and reason!
Shelley, in Dowden, I. 229.

hypothetic (hi-pō-thet'ik), a. [= F. hypothétique = Sp. hipotético = Pg. hipotético = It. ipotesico (cf. D. G. hypothetisch = Dan. hypothetisk = Sw. hypotetisk), < LL. hypotheticus, one who proceeds hypothetically, < Gr. ὑποθετικός, supposed, hypothetical, < ὑπόθεσις, hypothesis: see hypothesis.] Founded on or characterized by a hypothesis; supposititious; conjectural.

Essential errors in first principles naturally and necessarily lead to erroneous inferences; and it is in vain that the hypothetic notions will be assumed, in order to give the desired consistency to any particular theory.
T. Cogan, Disquisitions, ii. 1.

Hypothetic inference. See inference.—Hypothetic realism or dualism, the metaphysical doctrine that objects external to the consciousness are inferred to exist from the phenomena of consciousness.

hypothetical (hi-pō-thet'ik-āl), a. and n. [hypothetic + -al.] 1. a. Same as hypothetic, and the more common form.

I may notice by the way that there is a great deal of variation in the language of logicians in regard to the terms conditional and hypothetical. You are aware that conditionals in Latin is commonly applied as a translation of hypothetikos in Greek; and by Boethius, who was the first among the Latins who elaborated the logical doctrine of hypotheticals, the two terms are used convertibly with each other. By many of the schoolmen, however, the term hypothetical (hypotheticus) was used to denote the genus, and the term conditional to denote the species, and from them this nomenclature has passed into many of the more modern compends of logic—and among others, into those of Aldrich and Whately. This latter usage is wrong. If either term is to be used in subordination to the other, conditional, as the more extensive term, ought to be applied to designate the genus; and so it has accordingly been employed by the best logicians.
Sir W. Hamilton.

The numerical estimates of a large savage population must, of course, be in a great degree hypothetical.
Prescott, Ferd. and Isa., note.

The great event of Wordsworth's school-days was the death of his father, who left what may be called a hypothetical estate, consisting chiefly of claims upon the first Earl of Lonsdale. Lovell, Among my Books, 2d ser., p. 206.

Destructive hypothetical syllogism, a reasoning in this form: If A is, B is; but B is not, therefore A is not.—Hypothetical argument. See argument.—Hypothetical baptism. Same as conditional baptism (which see, under baptism).—Hypothetical period in grammar, a sentence expressing a condition and conclusion, or composed of a protasis and an apodosis.—Hypothetical proposition, in logic, (a) A proposition consisting of an antecedent and a consequent clause; one which states that two facts are in the relation of reason and consequent; one which excludes an event from the universe of possibility. (b) A proposition consisting of two or more clauses united by conjunctions, or which states a relation to exist between different possibilities.—Hypothetical question, a form of question allowed by the modern law of evidence for the purpose of calling out the opinion of an expert witness, such facts as the interrogating counsel claims he has already proved being stated as a hypothesis, and the witness being requested to state to the jury what his opinion is, supposing or assuming such facts to be true.—Hypothetical syllogism, a syllogism in which one of the premises is a hypothetical proposition. The following is an example of the form of inference which is usually considered as the direct hypothetical syllogism: If it lightens, it will thunder; it does lighten; hence, it will thunder. But some logicians refuse the name of syllogism to this inference, and consider the simplest type of hypothetical syllogism to be: If it thunders, it will lighten; if it rains, it will lighten; hence, if it rains, it will thunder.

II. n. A hypothetical proposition.

Universal abstract judgments and hypotheticals, on the other hand, appear to assert merely necessary connexion of ideal content, and therefore point only to that in the real which is the ground of the consequence necessarily following.
Mind, IX. 128.

hypothetically (hi-pō-thet'ik-āl), adv. In a hypothetical manner or relation; conjecturally.

Whenever anatomical investigation shows the combined action of several distinct fibres the resulting sensation may, hypothetically, be regarded as composite.
J. Sully, Sensation and Intuition, p. 59.

hypothetico-disjunctive (hi-pō-thet'ik-ō-dis-junk'tiv), a. Combining the characters of the hypothetic and disjunctive forms of proposition.—Hypothetico-disjunctive proposition, a hypothetical proposition with a disjunctive consequent.

hypothetist (hi-poth'-ē-tist), n. [hypothetic (+ -ist).] Same as hypothesist.

hypothetize (hi-poth'-ē-tiz), v. i.; pret. and pp. hypothetized, ppr. hypothetizing. [hypothetic (+ -ize).] Same as hypothesize.

hypotrachelium (hi-pō-trā-kē'li-um), n.; pl. hypotrachelia (-ē). [L. hypotrachelium, in arch., < Gr. ὑποτραχήλιον, the lower part of the neck, the neck of a column, < ὑποτραχίλος, under the neck, < ὑπό, under, + τραχήλος, the neck.]

In arch., in the Doric order, the junction of the capital and the shaft, marked by a bevel or cut around the lower edge of the capital block. The channeling is carried across the hypotrachelium, upon the capital, as far as the annulets. The hypotrachelium has the appearance of a sharp black line encircling the shaft near its summit. Its material function was to preserve the sharp arrises of the capital from chipping when the block was put in place; its artistic function is to serve as the first step in the transition from the vertical lines of the shaft to the horizontal lines of the entablature. Vitruvius applies the term hypotrachelium to the entire neck of the capital, or that part which, while in one block with the echinus, forms a continuation of the shaft. Also incision, hypotrachelion.

Hypotricha (hi-pō'tri-kā), n. pl. [NL, < Gr. ὑπό, under, + τρίχης (trich-), hair.] An order of ciliate infusorians. These animalcules are free-swimming, and are mostly flattened or compressed; the locomotive cilia are confined to the inferior or ventral surface, and often variously modified; the superior or dorsal surface is usually smooth or glabrous, but occasionally bears a few scattered or longitudinal rows of immotile setose cilia; the oral and anal apertures are conspicuously developed, and ventrally located; and trichocysts are rarely developed. The order was founded by Stein, and is contrasted with Heterotricha, Holotricha, and Peritricha. It contains about 6 families and 40 genera.

hypotrichous (hi-pō'tri-ki-us), a. [As Hypotricha + -ous.] 1. Of or pertaining to the Hypotricha, or to one of them.—2. Having locomotory cilia confined to the under side of the body: specifically said of the Hypotricha.

hypotrichously (hi-pō'tri-ki-us), adv. So as to be ciliate underneath. S. Kent.

Hypotrachelium (h, h), from a column of the Parthenon.

Hypotriorchis (hî-pot-ri-ôr'kis), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑποτριόρχης, a kind of broad-winged hawk, < ὑπό, under, + τριόρχης, a kind of hawk, prob. the buzzard, < τριόρχης, with three testicles, < τρεῖς (τρι-) = E. three, + ὄρχις, a testicle.] A genus of true falcons, of the subfamily Falconinae, of small size, represented by such species as the European hobby (H. subbuteo) and merlin (H. ascalon), and the American pigeon-hawk (H. columbarius); now commonly rated as a subgenus of Falco. Boie, 1826.

hypotrochoid (hî-pô-trô'koid), n. [< Gr. ὑπό, under, + E. trochoid.] A curve which can be traced by a point rigidly connected with a circle which rolls upon the interior of another circle.

This curve [one described by a gyroscopic pendulum] . . . is a species of hypotrochoid. Encyc. Brit., XI, 553.

hypotympanic (hî-pô-tim-pân'ik), a. and n. [< Gr. ὑπό, under, + τύπανον, a kettledrum; see tympanum.] I. a. Situated beneath the tympanum; as, the hypotympanic bone.

II. n. The so-called tympanic bone, as of birds and reptiles, commonly called the quadrate or os quadratum, which in many vertebrates below mammals forms the suspensorium of the lower jaw. Correlated with epitympanic. See quadrate, n. See cuts at Crotalus and Gallina.

hypotypic (hî-pô-tip'ik), a. [< Gr. ὑπό, under, + τύπος, type.] Subtypical; not quite typical; opposed to hypertypic.

hypotypical (hî-pô-tip'ik-al), a. [< hypotypic + -al.] Same as hypotypic.

hypotyposis (hî-pô-ti-pô'sis), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑποτύπωσις, a sketch, outline, < ὑποτυπώω, form slightly, sketch out, < ὑπό, under, + τύπος, impression, type.] 1. In rhet., vivid description of a scene or an event, as though it were present before the eyes of the audience; an oratorical word-picture. — 2. A sketch or outline of a science. — The Hypotyposes, the title of the exposition of the Pyrrhonian philosophy by Sextus Empiricus.

hypoxanthic (hî-pok-san'thik), a. [< hypoxanthine + -ic.] Derived from or having the character of hypoxanthine.

hypoxanthine (hî-pok-san'thin), n. [< Gr. ὑποξανθός, yellowish- or lightish-brown (< ὑπό, under, + ξανθός, yellow), + -ine.] A substance ($C_8H_{14}N_4O$) found in the muscles, liver, spleen, and other organs, which crystallizes in needles and forms compounds with both acids and bases. It is also produced during the putrefaction of proteins. Also called sarcine.

hypoxid (hî-pok'sid), n. [< Hypoxis (-id).] A plant of the order Hypoxidaceae. Lindley.

Hypoxidaceae (hî-pok-sid'ā-sē-ē), n. pl. [NL., < Hypoxis (-id) + -aceae.] A former natural order of plants, the genera of which are now referred to the natural order Amaryllidaceae, tribe Hypoxideae.

Hypoxideae (hî-pok-sid'ē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Robert Brown), < Hypoxis (-id) + -eae.] A tribe of monocotyledonous plants, of the natural order Amaryllidaceae, typified by the genus Hypoxis. The rhizome is tuberous or small; the leaves are radical (rarely a few on the stem); and the flowers are solitary on the scape, or sometimes spiked or racemose, rarely umbellate.

Hypoxis (hî-pok'sis), n. [NL. (Linnæus, prop. Hypoxys, so called because the pod is acute at the base), < Gr. ὑπό, under, + ὄξυς, sharp.]

A genus of plants of the natural order Amaryllidaceae, and the type of the tribe Hypoxideae. The perianth is 6-parted, and without a tube; the 3 outer segments of the perianth are slightly herbaceous outside; the stamens are 6 in number, and inserted upon a disk surrounding the ovary, which is 3-celled; and the capsule opens by a lid. They are herbaceous plants with mostly narrow, sometimes grass-like leaves, and single or racemose pretty flowers. About 50 species are known, widely distributed, but found mostly in the tropics. H. erecta, the star-grass, is a yellow-flowered species, a native of the United States. H. decumbens, of the West Indies and Brazil, is called star-of-Bethlehem.

Hypoxis erecta. a, flower; b, stamen; c, fruit; d, same, cut transversely.

cies are known, widely distributed, but found mostly in the tropics. H. erecta, the star-grass, is a yellow-flowered species, a native of the United States. H. decumbens, of the West Indies and Brazil, is called star-of-Bethlehem.

Hypoxylon (hî-pok'si-lon), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑπό, under, + ξύλον, wood.] A large genus of ascomycetous fungi, having the stroma corky or brittle, the perithecia immersed, and the sporidia ovate or lanceolate, curved, simple, and dark-colored. They grow on trees, decaying wood, dead branches, etc. H. vernicium, which is loosely cellular, is eaten by the natives of Bhutan.

hypoxylous (hî-pok'si-lus), a. [< Hypoxylon.] Of or pertaining to the genus Hypoxylon.

hypozeuxis (hî-pô-zûk'sis), n. [LL., < Gr. ὑπό, under, + ζεύξις, a subduing, a subordinate connection, < ὑποζεύγναι, yoke under, subject, < ὑπό, under, + ζεύγναι, yoke; see zeugma.] In gram. and rhet., a figure or construction in which, in a succession of clauses, each subject has its own verb; as, "The grass withereth, the flower fadeth; but the word of our God shall stand for ever," Isa. xl. 8. The following is another example:

On the slope
The sword rose, the hind fell, the herd was driven,
Fire glimpsed.
Tennyson, Coming of Arthur.

If this supple be made to sundrie clauses, or to one clause sundrie times iterated, and by several words, so as every clause hath his own supple, then it is called by the Greeks Hypozeuxis; we call him the substitute.

Puttenham, Arte of Eng. Poesie, p. 138.

Hypozaa (hî-pô-zô'ā), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. ὑπό, under, + ζῷον, an animal.] In zool., same as Protozoa.

hypozaon (hî-pô-zô'an), a. and n. I. a. Pertaining to or having the characters of the Hypozaa; protozoan.

II. n. One of the Hypozaa; a protozoan.

hypozaic (hî-pô-zô'ik), a. [< Gr. ὑπό, under, + ζῷον, life.] In geol., below the limit of life.

hypozaic (hî-pô-zô'ik), a. [< Hypozaa + -ic.] In zool., pertaining to the Hypozaa; hypozaon; protozoan.

hyped, hypish. See *hipped*², hippish.

Hypsibates (hip-sib'ā-tēs), n. [NL., < Gr. as if ὑψιβάτης, going aloft; cf. ὑψίστος, set on high, < ὑψη, on high (see hypso), + βάτης, verbal adj. of βαίνω, go, = E. come.] 1. A genus of very long-legged grallatorial birds; the stilts. Also called Himantopus. Nitzsch, 1829. — 2. A genus of reptiles. Originally written Hypsibatus.

Hypsibrachycephali (hip-si-brak-i-sef'ā-li), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. ὑψη, on high, aloft (ὑψος, height), + βραχύς, short, + κεφαλή, head.] In ethnol., those races of men that are characterized by high broad skulls, such as the Malay inhabitants of Madura.

hypsibrachycephalic (hip-si-brak'i-se-fal'ik or -sef'ā-lik), a. Having the characters of the Hypsibrachycephali.

hypsibrachycephalism (hip-si-brak-i-sef'ā-lizm), n. [As hypsibrachycephalic + -ism.] In ethnol., the presence or prevalence of high broad skulls.

hypsicephalic (hip'si-se-fal'ik or -sef'ā-lik), a. [< Gr. ὑψη, on high, + κεφαλή, head.] High, as a skull; exhibiting hypsicephaly.

hypsicephaly (hip-si-sef'ā-li), n. [As hypsicephalic + -y.] The character of a skull the cranial index of which is over 75. See craniometry.

hypsiloid (hip'si-loid), a. [< Gr. ὑψηλοειδής, shaped like upsilon, < ὑψηλόν, upsilon, + εἶδος, form.] Shaped like the Greek letter upsilon; curved or arched like U.

The palatal index of the male . . . is exceptionally low, viz. 1033, the general form of the palate being remarkably hypsiloid. Anthropological Jour., XVIII, 9.

Hypsilophodon (hip-si-lof'ō-don), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑψη, on high, + λόφος, crest, ridge, + ὄδον (ὄδωρ-) = E. tooth.] A remarkable genus of fossil Mesozoic dinosaurs, of the group Ornithomischia, found in the Wealden formation of the Isle of Wight, and exhibiting to a high degree the characteristics of birds, especially in the beak and hind limbs. The ends of the premaxilla appear to have been toothless and beak-like, and the mandibular symphysis is excavated to receive them, almost as in a parrot; the ischia are very long and slender, with a median ventral symphysis; the pubic bones are as long and slender as in a typical bird, and directed downward and backward, parallel with the ischia, leaving only a very narrow lengthened obturator foramen divided by the obturator process.

hypsilophodont (hip-si-lof'ō-dont), a. Pertaining to or having the characters of the genus Hypsilophodon.

It remains to be seen how far the hypsilophodont modification extended among the Ornithomischia.

Huxley, Anat. Vert., p. 225.

Hypsilophodontidae (hip-si-lof'ō-don'ti-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Hypsilophodon (-t) + -idae.] A family of dinosaurs with four functional digits in the hind feet, typified by the genus Hypsilophodon.

Hypsiprymninae (hip'si-prim-ni'nē), n. pl. [NL., < Hypsiprymnus + -inae.] A subfamily of Macropodidae, typified by the genus Hypsiprymnus; the kangaroo-rats, potorods, or betongs. It contains small marsupials, about as large as a rabbit, differing considerably from the true kangaroos in anatomical characters, as well as in general appearance and habits. They feed much on roots, which they dig up by means of their fore feet, the three middle digits of which are elongate. Besides Hypsiprymnus, the group includes such genera as Asiprymnus and Bettongia.

hypsiprymnine (hip-si-prim'nin), a. Same as hypsiprymnoid.

hypsiprymnoid (hip-si-prim'noid), a. [< Hypsiprymnus + -oid.] Resembling a kangaroo-rat; having the characters of the Hypsiprymninae.

As to the Didelphia, if we may trust the evidence which seems to be afforded by their very scanty remains, a true Hypsiprymnoid form existed at the epoch of the Trias, contemporaneously with a Carnivorous form. Huxley, Critiques and Addresses, p. 199.

Hypsiprymnus (hip-si-prim'nus), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑψίπρυνος, with high stern, < ὑψη, on high, aloft, + πρύμνα, the stern of a ship, prop. adj. (sc. ναῖς, ship), the hindmost, fem. of πρυνός, hindmost, endmost.] The typical genus of Hypsiprymninae, including the true kangaroo-rats or potorods, such as H. murinus of New South Wales, with a long scaly tail like a rat's, produced snout, and long coarse pelage. See cut under kangaroo-rat.

Hysistarian (hip-si-tā'ri-an), n. [< Gr. Ὑψιστάριος, pl., a Christian sect that distinguished between ὁ ὑψίστος θεός, the Most High God, and ὁ πατήρ, the Father; < ὑψίστος, highest, most high, superl. adj., < ὑψη, adv., on high, aloft.] One of a monotheistic sect in the fourth century, whose doctrines combined pagan, Jewish, and Christian ideas. They were perhaps successors of the Sabæans, but worshiped God only under the name of the Most High, and regarded fire and light as his special symbols. They were found chiefly in Cappadocia.

Hypsodon (hip-sō-don), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑψη, on high, + ὄδον (ὄδωρ-) = E. tooth.] 1. A genus of fossil fishes of large size, once considered to be related to the pikes, with long, pointed, and erect teeth. The remains occur in the Cretaceous formation of England. Agassiz. — 2. [I. c.] A fish of the genus Hypsodon.

hypsodont (hip-sō-dont), a. [< Gr. ὑψη, on high, + ὄδον (ὄδωρ-) = E. tooth.] Having lengthened crowns and short roots, the neck remaining long below the alveolar border of the socket: applied to such teeth as the molars of Bovidae, in distinction from the brachyodont dentition of Cervidae. See brachyodont. [The epithet has no reference to the ichthyic genus Hypsodon.]

Modification of [the selenodont form] from a brachyodont to a hypsodont type.

W. H. Flower, Encyc. Brit., XV, 429.

hypsography (hip-sog'ra-fi), n. [< Gr. ὑψη, on high, aloft, + γράφω, write, describe.] See the extract.

Eidography, . . . a word suggested as useful in discussing surveys, and having reference solely to the surface form of the earth, its ups and downs, its hills and hollows. The words hypsography and "topography" are each used for this purpose; but the first refers rather to elevation than to form, and "topography" has been and is used in different senses, hence its meaning is uncertain until defined by the writer using it. Science, XII, 280.

hypsometer (hip-som'e-tēr), n. [< Gr. ὑψη, on high, aloft, + μέτρον, a measure.] A thermometrical barometer for measuring altitudes. It consists essentially of a delicate thermometer, with which the temperature of the boiling-point of water at the given height is determined.

hypsometric (hip-sō-met'rik), a. [< hypsometer + -ic.] Of or pertaining to hypsometry.

The accuracy of the barometer as a hypsometric instrument may be very considerably increased.

J. D. Whitney, Barometric Hypsometry, Pref.

hypsometrical (hip-sō-met'ri-kal), a. [< hypsometric + -al.] Same as hypsometric; as, hypsometrical maps, which exhibit the heights of mountains, etc.

hypsometrically (hip-sō-met'ri-kal-i), adv. According to the rules and principles of hypsometry.

hypsometry (hip-som'e-tri), n. [As hypsometer + -y.] The art of measuring the heights of places upon the surface of the earth, either by leveling, by the barometer, by the thermometer, by trigonometrical observations, or otherwise.

The many curious and instructive results which a rather extensive examination of the literature of hypsometry since the beginning of the present century has brought to light.

J. D. Whitney, Barometric Hypsometry, p. 25.

hypophyll, hypophyll (hip-sō-fil), n. [Gr. ὑψήλον, on high, + φύλλον, a leaf.] The involucre leaves, bracts and bracteoles, glumes and paleae of flowers: a word introduced by Henfrey as a translation of the German Hochblatt. Compare cataphyllum, euphyllum.

hypophyllary (hip-sof i-lā-ri), a. [hypophyll + -ary.] Of, pertaining to, or of the nature of hypophyll.

hyposis (hip-sō'sis), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑψος, a lifting high, elevation, < ὑψοῖν, lift high, < ὑψέ, on high, aloft, ὑψόν, on high (ὑψος, height), prob. connected with ὑπέρ, over, above: see hyper.] In the Gr. Ch.: (a) The elevation of the eucharist. (b) The elevation of the panagia. (c) [cap.] The Exaltation of the Cross; Holy-Cross day (September 14th).

hypt, p. a. See hipped.

Hyptidae (hip-tid ē-ā), n. pl. [NL. (Endlicher, 1836-40), < Hyptis (-id-) + -ae.] A former tribe of labiate plants, typified by the genus Hyptis: now referred to the tribe Ocimoideae. Also written Hyptidæ.

Hyptis (hip'tis), n. [NL. (Jacquin, 1786), so called because the limb of the corolla is turned back; irreg. < Gr. ὑπτός, laid back, supine, < ὑπό, under.] A very large genus of labiate plants, of the tribe Ocimoideae. The calyx is ovoid-campanulate with 5 very acute teeth; the corolla is about as long as the calyx; and the upper lip has 4 entire lobes, the lower lip 1, undivided. They are herbs or shrubs of polymorphous habit. Two hundred and fifty species are known, all natives of tropical America, chiefly of Brazil. H. suaveolens of Cuba, Mexico, etc., is called spikenard.

Hyptidæus (hip-tī-dē-us), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑπὸ γῆς, underground, subterranean, < ὑπό, under, + οὐδὰς, poet., the ground.] A notable genus of voles or field-mice, of the subfamily Arvicolinae. The word is used in various senses: (a) As proposed by Illiger (1811), a synonym of Arvicola (Lacépède), and therefore nearly equivalent to the Arvicolinae collectively. (b) As restricted by Keyserling and Blasius (1842), and by Baird (1857), a synonym of Eutamias (Cuvier, 1874), the type being Mus rutilus of Pallas. See Eutamias.

hypural (hi-pū'ral), a. [Gr. ὑπό, under, + οὐρά, tail.] Situated beneath or on the under side of the tail: specifically applied in ichthyology to bones beneath the axis of the tail, supporting fin-rays.

Termination of Spinal Column of Salmon, with many expanded hypural bones.

In most osseous fishes the hypural bones which support the fin-rays of the inferior division (of the tail) become much expanded, and either remain separate, or coalesce into a wedge-shaped, nearly symmetrical bone.

Huxley, Anat. Vert., p. 21.

hyr, pron. See he.

Hyraes (hī-rā-sēz), n. pl. [NL., pl. of Hyrae.] Same as Hyraeidae. Wagler, 1830.

hyraceum, hyracium (hī-rā-sē-um, -si-um), n. [NL., < Hyrae (-ae), q. v.] A product of commercial value derived from the hyrax, and imported from the Cape of Good Hope as a substitute for castoreum.

hyracid (hī-rā'sid), n. A mammal of the family Hyraeidae; a hyrax.

Hyraeidae (hī-rā-sī-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Hyrae (-ae) + -idae.] The typical and only family of the order Hyraeidae. It formerly contained only one genus, Hyrae, but this has been subdivided by Gray into Hyrae proper, Dendrohyrae, and Eubhyrae. See cut under Hyrae.

hyraciform (hī-rā-sī-fōrm), a. [Gr. ὑράξ (-ae) + L. forma, shape.] Same as hyracoid.

Hyraeina (hī-rā-sī-nā), n. pl. [NL., < Hyrae (-ae) + -ina.] Same as Hyraeidae. C. L. Bonaparte, 1831.

hyracium, n. See hyraceum.

Hyraodon (hī-rak'ō-don), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑράξ, shrew-mouse, hyrax, + ὄδον (ōdōn) = E. tooth.] A genus of primitive rhinoceros-like perissodactyls from the Lower Miocene of North America, type of the family Hyraodontidae. They had 44 teeth, and only 3 digits on each foot. It is sometimes referred to the Rhinocerotidae.

hyraodont (hī-rak'ō-dont), a. [Gr. ὑράξ (-ae) + L. forma, shape.] Same as hyracoid. (t-) Having the form of dentition characteristic of Hyraodon, Hyrae, and Rhinoceros, in which the under molars have the external tubercles crescentic in section, longitudinally compressed, and continuous with the corresponding internal tubercles.

Hyraodontidae (hī-rak'ō-don'ti-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Hyraodon (t-) + -idae.] A family of fossil rhinoceros-like perissodactyls, established for the reception of the genus Hyraodon.

hyracoid (hī-rā-koid), a. [Gr. ὑράξ (-ae) + -oid.] Resembling a hyrax; pertaining to the Hyraeidae, or having their characters. Also hyraciform.

Hyraeidae (hī-rā-koi'dē-ā), n. pl. [NL., < Hyrae (-ae) + -idae.] An order of monadelphian mammals, represented by the single family Hyraeidae; the hyraes. It combines in its dentition characters of perissodactyl hoofed quadrupeds with others of rodents, the molars being like those of the rhinoceros in pattern, while the upper incisors are long, curved, and grow from persistent pulps as in the rodents. The dental formula is: 2 incisors in each half-jaw above and below, no canines, and 4 premolars and 3 molars in each upper and lower half-jaw—in all, 36. There are no clavicles. The fore feet are 4-toed, and the hind feet 3-toed; both are padded underneath, as in carnivores and rodents, not hooved, as in ungulates; the digits end in stout flat nails. This remarkable order of mammals, of which no fossil remains are known, is the living remnant of a very generalized type, combining characters of the ungulates on the one hand and of the rodents and insectivores on the other. The animals are of about the size of rabbits, and their general appearance is suggestive of these rodents; they are known as rock-rabbits, and by other names, and the order is also called Gliriformia and Lamninguia. See Hyraeidae and Hyrae. Also Hyraes, Hyraeina.

hyracotherian (hī-rā-kō-thē-ri-an), a. [Gr. ὑράξ (-ae) + -therian.] Pertaining or related to Hyracotherium.

hyracotheriine (hī-rā-kō-thē-ri-in), a. [Gr. ὑράξ (-ae) + -ine.] Same as hyracotherian.

Hyracotherium (hī-rā-kō-thē-ri-um), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑράξ (-ae), a shrew-mouse, + θηρίον, a wild beast.] A genus of fossil perissodactyls of the tapiroid section, referred to the family Lophiodontidae. Their dental formula is: 2 incisors above and 3 below on each side, 1 canine, 4 premolars, and 3 molars in each upper and lower half-jaw—in all, 42. The genus was based upon the skull of an animal of the size of a rabbit, from the London clay. The generic term, as used by De Blainville (1844), has been definitely located in the Lophiodontidae, and identified with Pachynolophus of Pomel (1847).

Hyrae (hī-raks), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑράξ, a mouse, shrew-mouse, = L. sorex, shrew-mouse: see Sorex.] 1. The typical genus of the family Hyraeidae and order Hyraeidae, having the molar teeth like those of a rhinoceros in pattern, the lower incisors only slightly notched, the upper incisors approximated, and the upper lip cleft. It has 7 cervical, 22 dorsal, 8 lumbar, 5 sacral, and 6 caudal vertebrae. The genus contains the terrestrial and saxicoline species of Africa and Syria, as H.

Damian (Hyrae syriacus).

capensis, H. habessinicus, H. syriacus, variously known as conies, damians, rock-badgers, rock-rabbits, etc. It was formerly conterminous with the family Hyraeidae.

2. [L. c.] An animal of the genus Hyrae. Hyrcanian (hēr-kā-ni-an), a. Of or pertaining to the ancient Hyrcania in Asia. Shak., Hamlet, ii. 2, 428.

hyre², v. t. See hire.

hyre², pron. See hire.

hyrnet, n. See hern.

hyrse (hērs), *n. See hirse.*

hyrst, n. See hurst.

hyson (hī'sn), n. [Chinese hi ch'ün, lit. blooming spring, i. e. first crop.] A brand of green tea produced in China. — Hyson skin, the refuse of hyson tea. — Young hyson, hyson tea picked early: called by the Chinese yü-chien (before the rains), in allusion to the season of picking.

hy-spy (hī'spi), n. See I-spy.

hyssop (hīs'up), n. [Formerly hissop, hisop; earlier without the aspirate, ME. isopp, ysope, < AS. ysope = D. hizop = MLG. isop = MHG. isope, isop, ispe, & isop, ysopp = Sw. Dan. isop = OF. ysope, hysope, hysoppe, F. hysope = Sp. hisopo = Pg. hysopo, hysopo = It. isopo, issopo, < L. hysopum, hysopum, hysopus, ML. also ysopus, < Gr. ὑσώπος, ὑσώπων, an aromatic plant, < Heb. ezoph, an aromatic plant, different from the mod. hyssop, which is not found in Syria or Egypt.] 1. A small bushy herb of the genus Hyssopus, natural order Labiatae. H. officinalis, common in gardens, is aromatic and stimulating, and was formerly used as an expectorant. Decoctions of the leaves are used externally in bruises and indolent swellings. See Hyssopus.

2. In Script., a plant the twigs of which were used for sprinkling in the ceremony of purification. It is supposed by some to have been the caper-bush, Capparis spinosa, and by others a plant or several plants growing in Palestine and allied with the European hyssop.

He [Solomon] spake of trees, from the cedar tree that is in Lebanon even unto the hyssop that springeth out of the wall.

1 Ki. iv. 33.

He took the blood of calves and of goats, with water, and scarlet wool, and hyssop, and sprinkled both the book, and all the people.

Heb. ix. 19.

He passed the grave, to throw a handful of earth into it, and sprinkle it with hyssop.

Longfellow, Hyperion, iv. 8.

3. Eccles., same as asperosarium, 1. See quotation from Prescott under asperum, 1. — Solomon's hyssop, thought by some to be a minute moss, Gymnostomum truncatum; by others identified with the caper-bush, Capparis spinosa. — Wild hyssop, Verbena hastata.

Hyssopidae (his-ō-pid ē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Lindley, 1846), < Hyssopus (-id-) + -ae.] A former subtribe of plants, containing the single genus Hyssopus, belonging to the natural order Labiatae. The genus Hyssopus is now referred to the tribe Satureieae.

Hyssopus (his-sō'pus), n. [L.: see hyssop.] A monotypic genus of plants of the natural order Labiatae, tribe Satureieae. The calyx is tubular, 15-nerved, equally 5-toothed, and naked in the throat; the corolla equals the calyx, and has two lips; the stamens are 4 in number, exerted and diverging; and the nutlets are ovoid. It is a perennial herb with wand-like simple branches, lanceolate or linear entire leaves, and blue-purple flowers in small clusters crowded in a spike. H. officinalis, the only species, originally from the Mediterranean region and middle Asia, but now widely cultivated and naturalized, is the hyssop of the gardens.

hystatite (his'tā-tit), n. [After the orig. G. hystatites eisenarz (Breithaupt); formation not obvious.] A variety of menaccanite or titanite iron.

hysteralgia (his-te-rāl'ji-ā), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑστεράλγος, causing pains in the uterus, < ὑστέρα, the uterus, + ἄλγος, pain.] In pathol., neuralgia of the uterus.

hysteralgic (his-te-rāl'jik), a. [Gr. ὑστεράλγος + -ic.] Of, pertaining to, or affected with hysteralgia.

hysteranthous (his-te-ran'thus), a. [Gr. ὑστερον, later, after (see hysteresis), + ἄνθος, a flower.] In bot., putting forth leaves after the appearance of the flowers: as, the willows, poplars, etc., are hysteranthous plants.

hysterectomy (his-te-rek'tō-mi), n. [Gr. ὑστέρα, the uterus, + ἐκτομή, a cutting out, < ἐκ, out, + τέμνειν, ταμίνε, cut.] In surg., the excision of the uterus.

hysteresis (his-te-rē'sis), n. [Gr. ὑστέρον, a coming short, deficiency, < ὑστερεῖν, be behind or later, come short, < ὑστερον, later, latter, coming after, behind, second (= AS. ūttera, E. utter, outer), compar. (with superl. ὑστατος), from a base uō* (= Skt. ud = AS. ūt, E. out): see out.] A lagging of one of two related phenomena behind the other. The changes in the thermo-electric and magnetic quality of stretched iron wire, due to cyclical variations in the stress to which it is subjected, lag behind the changes in stress, and this lagging is called hysteresis. The word is applied also to other physical phenomena of a similar character.

hysteria (his-tē'ri-ā), n. [NL. hysteria, < Gr. ὑστέρα, the womb, uterus (= L. uterus, for uterus* (?), m., the womb, = Skt. udara, neut., the belly), prob. fem. to ὑστερος, latter (lower): see hysteresis and uterus.] A nervous disease involving no recognizable anatomical lesion, characterized by unrestrained desire to attract attention and sympathy, more or less coordinated convulsions, globus and clonus hystericius, anaesthesia, hyperaesthesia, motor paralysis, vasomotor derangements, etc. Women are much more frequently affected in this way than men. Also called hysterics.

It is impossible to conceive hysteria attacking one who was not a social being, or one again who, Robinson Crusoe-like, was planted alone on an uninhabited island.

Maudsley, Body and Will, p. 259.

hysteric (his-ter'ik), a. and n. [= F. hystérique = Sp. histerico = Pg. histerico = It. isterico (cf.

Hyssop (Hyssopus officinalis). a, flower; b, fruit.

D. G. hysterisch = Dan. Sw. hysterisk), < L. hystericus, < Gr. ὑστερικὸς, suffering in the uterus, hysterical, < ὑστέρα, the uterus: see hysteria.]
I. a. 1. Relating to, resulting from, affected with, or subject to hysteria.

Parent of vapours, and of female wit,
 Who give th' hysterie or poetic fit.
 Pope, R. of the L., iv. 60.

2. Having the characteristics of hysteria; emotionally disordered; fitful; frantic.

With no hysterie weakness or feverish excitement, they preserved their peace and patience. Bancroft.

Hysteria aura. See *aura*¹.

II. n. A fit of hysteria: commonly in the plural.

The marquis sank down in his chair in a sort of hysterie. Bulwer, Pelham, lxx.

A love of freedom rarely felt,
 Of freedom in her regal seat
 Of England; not the schoolboy heat,
 The blind hysterics of the Celt.

Tennyson, In Memoriam, cix.

hysterical (his-ter'i-kal), a. [hysterie + -al.] Same as hysterie, and the more common form.

With all his great talents, and all his long experience of the world, he had no more self-command than a petted child or a hysterical woman.

Macaulay, Frederic the Great.

The last hysterical struggle of rhyme to maintain its place in tragedy. Swinburne, Shakespeare, p. 41.

hysterically (his-ter'i-kal-i), adv. In a hysterical manner; spasmodically.

hysteriform (his-ter'i-fōrm), a. [hysterie, < NL. hysteria, < Gr. ὑστέρα, the uterus: see hysteria], + L. forma, form.] 1. Resembling or having the character of hysteria.—2. In bot., having the form or appearance of fungi of the genus Hysterium.

Hysterinæ (his-tē-rin'ē-ē), n. pl. [NL., < Hysterium + -in + -æ.] A family of ascomycetous fungi, typified by the genus Hysterium.

hysteritis (his-tē-rī'tis), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑστέρα, the uterus, + -itis.] In pathol., inflammation of the uterus; metritis.

Hysterium (his-tē-ri-um), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑστερος, later: see hysteresis.] A large genus of ascomycetous fungi, having the perithecia labiate, the border entire, and the asci elongated. They grow on decayed wood, branches, leaves, etc.

hysterocele (his-tē-rō-sēl), n. [Gr. ὑστέρα, the uterus, + κῆλη, tumor.] A form of hernia involving the uterus.

hystero-dynia (his-tē-rō-din'i-ā), n. [Gr. ὑστέρα, the uterus, + δύνη, pain.] Pain of the womb.

hystero-epilepsy (his-tē-rō-ep'i-lep-si), n. In pathol., a form of convulsive attack which presents a greater amount of coördination than ordinary epilepsy, and in this respect resembles a hysterical attack. Also called hystero-convulsion.

hystero-epileptic (his-tē-rō-ep-i-lep-tik), a. Having the character of hysteria and of epilepsy; hysterically epileptiform.

hystero-geny (his-tē-rō-jen'ik), a. [hystero-geny + -ic.] 1. Producing hysteria; also, related to the production of hysteria.

In order to illustrate further the intimate connection between certain morbid forms of sleep and the hysterical state, I shall briefly allude to the so-called "hystero-genic" and "hypno-genic" pressure points discovered by Professors Charcot and Pitres. Fortnightly Rev., N.S., XLII. 787.

She presents various hystero-genic points, one cutaneous in the precordial region, below the mamma, and one over the right ovary. Alien. and Neurol., VII. 365.

2. In bot., a term applied to those intercellular spaces in plants which are formed in old, partly differentiated tissues. Compare protopenic.

hystero-genous (his-tē-rō-jen'us), a. [hystero-geny + -ous.] Same as hystero-genic.

hystero-geny (his-tē-roj'e-ni), n. [NL. hysteria, hysteria, + Gr. -γενεα: see -geny.] Production of hysteria; induction of hysterics or hysterical states.

hystero-oid (his-tē-ro'id), a. [NL. hysteria, hysteria, + Gr. εἶδος, form.] In pathol., resembling hysteria: as, a hystero-oid disease or symptom.

Hystero-oid conditions and feigned diseases. Alien. and Neurol., VI. 475.

Hystero-oid convulsion. Same as hystero-epilepsy.
hystero-oid (his-tē-ro'id), a. [hystero-oid + -al.] Same as hystero-oid.

Their value is much diminished by the unmistakable hystero-oid impress which they bear. Medical News, L. 37.

hystero-logy¹ (his-tē-roj'ō-ji), n. [Gr. ὑστέρα, the uterus, + -λογία, < λέγειν, speak: see -ology.] The knowledge of or a treatise on the uterus.

hystero-logy² (his-tē-roj'ō-ji), n. [= F. hystérologie, < LL. hystero-logia, < Gr. ὑστερολογία, hysteron-proteron, < ὑστερος, later, latter; cf. ὑστεροπόλος, speaking last, < ὑστερος, the latter (see hysteresis), + -λογία, < λέγειν, speak: see -ology.] Same as hysteron-proteron, 1.

hystero-mania (his-tē-rō-mā'ni-ā), n. [Gr. ὑστέρα, the uterus (see hysteria), + μανία, madness.] 1. Hysterical mania; a mania developing in persons who have previously exhibited hysterical symptoms, and which presents many hysterical features, with delusions, hallucinations, illusions, and an unrestrained endeavor to attract attention.—2. Nymphomania.

hystero-meter (his-tē-rom'ē-tēr), n. [Gr. ὑστέρα, the uterus, + μέτρον, a measure.] An instrument for measuring the uterus; a uterine sound.

hysteron-proteron (his-tē-ron-prot'e-ron), n. [LL., < Gr. ὑστερον πρότερον, lit. the latter first, also called πρόυστερον, lit. the first last (latter); neut. of ὑστερος, later, latter, and πρότερος, compar., former, fore, first (πρώτος, superl., first).] 1. In rhet., a figure by which what should come last in order of time or of logical sequence is introduced first, and vice versa; a transposition of words involving an inversion of the natural and logical order of events or subjects. The motive for the use of this figure is to mention first the idea which is the more prominently before the mind. An example is: "Morianur, et in media arma ruamus" (Let us die, and rush into the midst of the fray), Virgil, Æneid, ii. 385. Also called hystero-logy and prothysteron, and sometimes considered the same as anastrophe. 2. In logic, the fallacy which consists in offering as a proof of what is really an axiom some theorem which can be proved only by means of that axiom.

hystero-phore (his-tē-rō-fōr), n. [Gr. ὑστέρα, the uterus, + -φόρος, < φέρειν = E. *bear*¹.] A pessary for supporting the uterus.

hystero-phytal (his-tē-rō-fī-tal), a. [Hystero-phyta.] Having the characters or appearance of the Hystero-phyta or Fungi.

hystero-phyte (his-tē-rō-fī-t), n. [NL. hystero-phytum, < Gr. ὑστέρα, the uterus, + φυτόν, a plant.] Properly, a member of the Hystero-phyta; a fungus of any kind; in common usage, any fungus growing upon organic matter, from which it derives its nourishment; a saprophyte.

hystero-tome (his-tē-rō-tōm), n. [Gr. ὑστέρα, the uterus, + τομή, cutting.] An instrument for cutting the uterus; especially, a knife or scissors for enlarging the cervical canal of the uterus.

hystero-tomy (his-tē-rot'ō-mi), n. [Gr. ὑστέρα, the uterus, + τομή, a cutting, < τέμνειν, ταμεῖν, cut.] In surg., the operation of cutting in the uterus.

hystero-trachelorrhaphy (his-tē-rō-trā-kē-lor'-a-fi), n. [Gr. ὑστέρα, the uterus, + τράχηλος, the neck, + ράφή, a sewing, < ράπτειν, sew.] In surg., a plastic operation on the neck of the uterus.

hystriacisias (his-tri-sī'a-sis), n. [NL., < L. hystrix (hystrix), porcupine, + -iasis.] Same as hystriacismus.

hystricid (his'tri-sid), n. A rodent mammal of the family Hystriidae.

Hystriidae (his-tris'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Hystrix (Hystrix) + -idae.] A family of simplicitent rodents in which the pelage consists in part of stout spines; the porcupines. They are of large size as compared with other hystriine rodents. Some are terrestrial and fossorial, with very long spines, and confined to the old world; others are chiefly arboreal, with short spines, and confined to the new world. The family is thus divisible into two subfamilies, Hystriinae and Sphingurinae.

Hystriinae (his-tri-sī'nē), n. pl. [NL., < Hystrix (Hystrix) + -inae.] A subfamily of Hystriidae; the old-world or ground porcupines. They inhabit the Palearctic, Indian, and Ethiopian regions. There are two leading genera, Hystrix and Atherura. The subfamily is sometimes called Atherurinae.

hystriine (his'tri-sin), a. [L. hystrix (hystrix), a porcupine, + *-ine*¹.] Resembling or related to a porcupine; hystricomorphic.

hystriacismus (his-tri-siz'tus), n. [NL., < L. hystrix (hystrix), porcupine, + -ismus, E. -ism.] In pathol., an extreme form of ichthyosis, in which the epidermis grows out into spines. Also hystriacisias.

hystricomorph (his'tri-kō-mōrf), n. Any member of the Hystricomorpha.

Hystricomorpha (his'tri-kō-mōr'fā), n. pl. [NL., < L. Hystrix (Hystrix), < Gr. ὑστρίξ (ὑστρίξ), porcupine, + μορφή, form.] A series of simplicitent rodents; one of three prime divisions of rodents, including the porcupines and their congeners. The group is characterized by normal upper incisors and distinct tibia and fibula, the angular part of the mandible springing from the outer side of the bony covering of the incisor. The dental formula is: 1 incisor in each half-jaw above and below, no canines, and 1 premolar and 8 molars in each upper and lower half-jaw—in all 30 (except in Ctenodactylus, which has no premolars). The skull has no distinct postorbital process (except in Chaetonyx). The group corresponds to the Hystriinae of Waterhouse, and includes the seven families Hydrochordae, Caviidae, Dinomysidae, Dasyproctidae, Chinchilidae, Hystriidae, and Octodontidae. There is the greatest diversity in the external aspect and habits of these animals, few of which specially resemble porcupines in general appearance. Except four remarkable outlying genera of Octodontidae and the old-world porcupines of the genera Hystrix and Atherura, the whole series is American, and almost confined to South America; for there are only three West Indian forms (as Capromys), and only two species of porcupine, of the genus Erethizon, occur in North America.

hystricomorphic (his'tri-kō-mōr'fik), a. [Hystricomorpha + -ic.] Pertaining to the Hystricomorpha, or having their characters; hystriine, in a broad sense.

Hystrix (his'triks), n. [L., also written Hystrix (stem hystrix instead of hystrix*), < Gr. ὑστρίξ (ὑστρίξ), a porcupine, in pl. bristles, appar. < ῥα, a hog, + θρίξ (θρίξ), hair.] 1. The typical genus of Hystriidae, formerly conterminous with the family, now restricted to the common old-world porcupines, with very long spines or quills, such as those used for penholders. H. cristata is the leading species, inhabiting southern Europe and northern Africa. See porcupine.—2. [l. c.] An animal of this genus.

hyte (hīt), a. [Origin obscure.] Mad; crazy. Also hite. [Scotch.]

The witching, curs'd, delicious blinkers Ha'e put me hyte. Burns, To Major Logan.

hythe, n. See hithe.

1. The ninth letter and third vowel in the English alphabet. The character comes, like most of its predecessors (see A, etc.), through the Latin and Greek from the Phœnician, and ultimately perhaps from the Egyptian. The correspondences are as follows:

- // - 4 7 - 2 1 -
Egyptian. Hieratic. Phœnician. Early Greek and Latin.

The Phœnician character represented rather a consonant, a y, than a vowel, but it was converted to vowel value by the Greeks, and has continued to bear that value since (though in Latin used as consonant also). Our "short i" of it, etc., is not far from the original sound; yet nearer is the sound which we perversely call "long e" (of metre, meat, etc.), or the i of machine, pique, etc. Because the words which anciently showed this latter sound have in great measure changed it to a diphthongal utterance (nearly ä + i, or the ai of aisle), we have come to call the altered sound "long i." The true i-sounds (in pick, pique) are close vowels, made with as near an approximation of the organs as is possible without giving rise to a fricative utterance. The approximation is made by the upper flat surface of the tongue to the palate, at or near the point where a complete closure makes a k-sound. Hence the i-sound has palatal affinities, and it (as also in less degree the e) is widely active in palatalizing a consonant: for example, in converting in modern English a t to ch, a d to j, an s to sh, a z to zh; having in older English, and in other languages, a like influence on a k or g. Hence, also, it is a vowel close to a consonant, and very nearly identical with the consonantal y, into which it passes freely. (See Y.) I has also gained in many words before r the same sound that e and u have in the same situation: for example, fir, first. It enters into various digraphs, as ai, ei, ie, oi, ui.

2. As a symbol: (a) The number one in the Roman notation. It is repeated for subsequent numbers up to three (formerly to four) (II, III, IIII). These numerals placed after symbols of higher numbers increase their value: as, VI, six; VII, seven, etc.; XII, twelve; LIII, fifty-three; formerly CIII, one hundred and four. Instead of the old LIII and VIII for four and nine, an I is now prefixed to V or X to decrease the value by one: thus, IV, four; IX, nine.

Thider come the kynges Vrien of gorre, that was a yonge knight, and moche preised in armes, and with hym tyde C (four hundred) knyghtes. Merlin (E. E. T. S.), l. 108.

(b) In logic, a symbol of the particular affirmative proposition: derived from the second vowel of the Latin word affirmo, I assert. See *A*¹, 2 (b).

A doeth affirme, E doeth denigh, which are bothe universal: I doeth affirme, O doeth denigh, which we particular call. Sir T. Wilson, Rule of Reason (1551).

(c) In chem., the symbol for iodine.—3. An abbreviation—(a) In dental formulae, in zool., for incisor. (b) Same as i. e. (c) See i. e., i. q.

I² (i), pron. and n.; poss. my or mine, obj. (dat. and acc.), me, pl. nom. we, poss. our or ours, obj. (dat. and acc.) us. [Also dial. I (pron. ē), a, ich; < ME. i, reduced form of (Northern) ik, assimilated (Southern) ich, uch, < AS. i = OS. ik, ik, ec = OFries. ik = D. ik = MLG. ik, ek = OHG. ih, MHG. G. ich = Icel. ek = Sw. jag = Dan. jeg = Goth. ik = W. i = L. ego (> It. io = Pg. eu = Sp. yo = Pr. eu, teu = OF. eo, jeo, jo, mod. F. je = E. ego as a philosophical term: see ego) = Gr. ἐγώ, ἐγών = Lith. asz = Lett. es = OBulg. azŭ, jazŭ = Russ. There are in AS. and E. four apparent stems, represented by I, me, we, and us: see me, we, our, us.] I. pron. The nominative case of the pronoun of the first person; the word by which a speaker or writer denotes himself.

Now i geten a greece that i gaynli knowe.
William of Palerne (E. E. T. S.), l. 636.

But ik am oold: me list not play for age.
Chaucer, Prolog, to Reeve's Tale, l. 18.

So pray I to my lordes all,

Shak., Sonnets, xlii.

But as he grows he gathers much,
And learns the use of I, and me,
And finds "I am not what I see,
And other than the things I touch."
Tennyson, In Memoriam, xlv.

(The pronoun may take (rarely) a qualifying adjective.

Poor I was slain when Bassianus died.
Shak., Tit. And., ii. 3.]

I AM, a title of Jehovah (Ex. iii. 14). The Hebrew word here rendered I AM is equivalent in meaning to Jehovah, and differs from it very slightly in form. In the margin of the revised version it is rendered "I will be," and some make it "I shall be." The word expresses absolute, and therefore unchanging and eternal, being.

II. n. 1. The pronoun I used as a substantive.—2. In metaph., the object of self-consciousness; that which is conscious of itself as thinking, feeling, and willing; the ego.

It is I that perceive, I that imagine, I that remember, I that attend, I that compare, I that feel, I that desire, I that will, I that am conscious. The I, indeed, is only manifested in one or other of these special modes; but it is manifested in them all; they are only the phenomena of the I, and therefore, the science conversant about the phenomena of mind is, most simply and unambiguously, said to be conversant about the phenomena of the I or the Ego.
Sir W. Hamilton, Metaph., ix.

I³ (i), interj. An obsolete form of *aye*³.

Bayes. They do me the right, Sir, to approve of what I do.

Johns. I, I, they will clap, I warrant you.
Buckingham, The Rehearsal, i.

i⁴, n. An occasional obsolete spelling of eye.
Skelton.

i⁵, i¹. [ME. i = Icel. ī, reduced form of in: see *in*¹, and cf. a³, reduced form of am, on, and a², reduced form of an.] A light form of *in*¹: as, "a worm i's the bud," Shak.

i¹, i². [ME. i, y, sometimes e, o, early ge, < AS. ge = OS. gi = OFries. gi, ge, ie = D. ge = MLG. Lg. ge = OHG. ga, gi, ge (ka, ke), MHG. gi, ge, G. ge (extremely common) = Icel. g (scarcely found except in glíkr, mod. líkr = AS. gēlic, E. *like*², a) = Goth. ga: a general Teut. prefix, in some uses equiv. to L. con- (com-, co-, etc.) = Gr. συν-, συν-, together, with (see con-, syn-), but hardly of the same origin.] A prefix (often spelled y, and sometimes e and a) common in Middle English, as in i-blent, i-cast, i-don, i-take, i-cleped, i-wis, etc. (Also spelled y-blent, y-cast, y-don, etc.), but entirely lost in modern English, except as traces remain in y-wis, adv. (sometimes erroneously written I wis), and in y-clept and a few other archaic perfect-participle forms affected by Spenser and other poets, and in alike, along², among, enough, everywhere, handiwork, and a few other common words in which the syllable concerned is not now recognized as a prefix. This prefix was extremely common in Anglo-Saxon, being used with nouns, adjectives, pronouns, and adverbs (having with these a collective or generalizing force, often so indefinite as not to be felt), but especially with verbs (having with these a collective force often translatable by together or with, or a collective or transitive force, and hence much used in the formation of nouns from intransitive verbs); in many instances it added nothing to the force of the verb to which it was prefixed. In Anglo-Saxon many verbs, as in German all verbs, without this or another prefix in the finite forms, take it in the past participle.

i². A form of the negative prefix in-³ before gn- in some words of Latin origin, as in ignoble, ignore, ignorant, etc.

i¹. [See i¹.] An apparent connective, but properly a prefix, in hand-i-work and hand-i- craft (altered from hand-craft in imitation of handiwork), and (now spelled -y- in ever-y-where). See these words, and compare i¹.

i². [L. -i-, being the stem-vowel, original, conformed, or supplied as a connective, of the first element in the compound; = Gr. -o-, rarely -i-: see -o-.] The usual 'connecting vowel,' properly the stem-vowel of the first element, of compound words taken or formed from the Latin, as in multi-i-form, cent-i-ped, ens-i-form, omni-i-potent, aur-i-ferous, bell-i-gent, etc. In forming New Latin compounds, the vowel is regularly -i-, as scuti-fera (< L. scutum (scuto) + fera), even when the second element is Greek, as scuti-phora (< L. scutum (scuto), + Gr. φορός); but in the latter case the vowel -o-, proper to Greek compounds, is often used, as scuto-pleris (< L. scutum (scuto) + Gr. πλερός). Even when both elements are Latin, the connective -o- is sometimes used; but it is properly confined to Greek and other non-Latin compounds. See -o-.

i¹-i². [L. -ia, Gr. -ia, being -i-, stem-vowel, + *-a*¹, nom. suffix of first declension: see *-a*¹.] A termination in Latin and Greek nouns (chiefly feminine), many of them in English use, being *-a*¹ preceded by -i-, a stem-vowel, formative or euphonic, as in tibi-a, fasci-a, militi-a, man-i-a, seor-i-a, etc. When such forms are Anglicized, the termination becomes -y, as in family, from Latin familia.

i²-a². [L. -ia, Gr. -ia, being -i-, stem-vowel, + *-a*², nom. pl. suffix: see *-a*².] A termination in Latin and Greek nouns, many of them in English use, being *-a*² preceded by -i-, a stem-vowel, formative or euphonic, as in regal-i-a, saturnal-i-a, etc.

i²-ac, i²-acal. See -ac.
Iache (i'a-kē), n. [NL., < Gr. Ίαχη, a nymph, companion of Proserpine; cf. ιαχή, a cry, shout, a joyous sound, < ιαχέω, cry, shout.] A genus of humming-birds of the family Trochilidae, of which the type is the broad-billed hummer, I. latirostris, a Mexican species, occurring also in the United States. D. G. Elliot, 1879. Also called Circe.

iacinth, n. See jacinth.
i²-al. A form of -al, being -al preceded by an original or euphonic vowel i. See -al.

Ialtris (i-al'tris), n. [NL., < Gr. ιάλτρειν (verbal adj. ιατρός), send forth.] A genus of eulubri-form ophiidians, related to Dromicium, but having no solid teeth on the maxillary bone behind the long median one. The type is I. vulturnus of Hayti. E. D. Cope, Proc. Acad. Nat. Sci., Phila., 1862, p. 73.

iamb (i'amb), n. [= F. iambe = Sp. yambo = Pg. It. jambo, < L. iambus: see iambus.] Same as iambus. [Rare.]

The license is sometimes carried so far as to add three short syllables to the last iamb. Bramble.

iambelegus (i-am-bel'e-gus), n. [LL., < Gr. ιαμβέλεγος, < ιαμβος, iambus, + έλεγος, an elegiac poem: see iambus and elegy.] In anc. pros., an episyntetic meter consisting of an iambic colon followed by a dactylic penthemimeres (half an elegiac pentameter).

iambic (i-am'bik), a. and n. [= F. iambique = Sp. yámbico = Pg. It. jambico, < LL. iambicus, < Gr. ιαμβικός, iambic, < ιαμβος, an iambus: see iambus.] I. a. 1. Pertaining to the iambus; employing iambics: as, iambic meter; an iambic poet.—2. Consisting of an iambus, or of iambics: as, an iambic foot; an iambic verse or poem.—Iambic class (of feet). Same as diplastic or double class. See diplastic.

II. n. in pros. (a) Same as iambus. (b) A verse or metrical period consisting of iambi. Iambics have been a favorite or prevalent form of verse in the poetry of many nations. They were used among the Greeks from early times in popular poetry, especially of a festive or a vitiative character. English heroic verse is the iambic pentapody or trimeter brachycalectic (— — — — —). Iambics of various lengths form the great bulk of all English poetry, other meters being comparatively rare. See choliamb, hipponactean, isochorhagic, scanzon, trimeter, senarius, seplenarius, octonarius.

iambical (i-am'bi-kal), a. [< iambic + -al.] Same as iambic. [Rare.]

Amongst us I name but two iambical poets, Gabriel Harvey and Richard Stanbury, because I have seen no more in this kind. Meres (Arber's Eng. Garner, II, 100).

iambically (i-am'bi-kal-i), adv. In the manner of an iambic.

iambize (i-am'biz), v. t.; pret. and pp. iambized, ppr. iambizing. [< Gr. iambyzein, assail in iambics, lampoon, < iamboz, iambus, iambic verse, a lampoon; see iambus.] To satirize in iambic verse. [Rare.]

Iambic was the measure in which they used to iambize each other. Twining, tr. of Aristotle on Poetry, I, § 6.

iambographer (i-am-bog'ra-fer), n. [< Gr. iambo-graphos, a writer of iambics, < iamboz, iambus, + graphein, write.] A writer of iambic poetry. [Rare.]

Mont. I am an iambographer; now it is out. Cata. For honour's sake, what's that?

Mont. One of the sourest versifiers that ever crept out of Parnassus. Shirley, Maid's Revenge, I, 2.

iambographic (i-am-bō-graf'ik), a. [< Gr. iambo-graphos, a writer of iambics (see iambographer), + -ic.] 1. Of or pertaining to the writing of iambics.—2. Accustomed to write iambic poetry. [Rare.]

The melic and iambographic poets. Amer. Jour. Philol., VII, 378.

iambus (i-am'bus), n.; pl. iambi (-bi). [< L. iambus, < Gr. iampos, an iambus, an iambic verse, an iambic poem, esp. a lampoon; so called, it is said, because first used by satiric writers; < iampeu, send or drive on, throw, assail with words, = L. jacere (accere), throw; see factitate, jet.] In pros., a foot of two syllables, the first short or unaccented and the second long or accented. The iambus of modern or accentual versification consists of an unaccented syllable followed by an accented one, without regard to the relative time taken in pronouncing the two syllables. Thus in English verse the words dimight, dilate, emit, abst would all be treated as iambi, while on the principles of ancient prosody the first of these words would be an iambus, but the second a spondee (an anapestic spondee, — >), the third a trochee, and the last a pyrrhic. The iambus of Greek and Latin poetry (— >) is quantitative, and as the first syllable is short, and the second being long is equal to two shorts, the whole foot has a magnitude of three shorts (is trisemic). Also called iamb, iambic.

-ian. A form of -an, being -an preceded by an original or euphonic vowel i. See -an.

Ianthina (i-an'thi-nā), n. [NL., fem. of ianthinus, < Gr. ianthinos, violet-colored, < lov (Flav), violet (= L. vio-la, violet), + anthos, a flower.] 1. The representative genus of the family Ianthinidae; the oceanic violet-snails. One of the best-known species is I. fragilis. They are found floating in shoals on the open seas of warm latitudes, buoyed up by the peculiar float attached to the foot, and are often cast ashore in vast numbers during storms. The animal which irritated pours out a violet secretion, serving to some extent for concealment, like the ink of the cuttlefish.

Violet-snail (Ianthina fragilis). a, float; b, eggs; c, gills; d, tentacles.

2. [f. c.] A violet-snail.

Ianthinidae (i-an-thin'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Ianthina + -idae.] A family of oceanic gastropods, having a small foot, the under side of which is connected with a vascular appendage or float, which buoys the animal in the water, and under which the eggs are received; the violet-snails. The shell is thin and violet-colored, with a twisted pillar, 4-sided aperture, and waved outer lip giving passage to exposed gills. The head is large, obtuse, and protruded beyond the mouth, with a short proboscis and blind tentacles. The radula is without central teeth, but has many long, curved, pen-like teeth on the sides. The remarkable appendage or float is several times as long as the body. There was formerly much question as to the position of the family, which has even been classed with the Heteropoda.

Iapetus (i-ap'e-tus), n. [L., < Gr. Iapetos, in myth, a Titan, son of Uranus and Ge.] 1. In astron., the eighth or outermost, formerly called the fifth, of the satellites of Saturn.—2. In entom., a genus of homopterous insects, of the family Fulgoroidea. Stål, 1863.

Iapygian (i-a-pij'i-an), a. and n. [< L. Iapygia, Gr. Iapygia, < L. Iapyges, Gr. Iapyges (see Iapyx), + -an.] 1. a. Of or pertaining to Iapygia, an ancient division of southeastern Italy, so called by the Greeks, corresponding to the peninsular part of Apulia, anciently also called Messapia and Calabria, and sometimes extended to the whole of Apulia.

II. n. One of the ancient Italian race inhabiting Iapygia, including the Messapians and other tribes.

iapygid (i-ap'i-jid), n. A member of the family Iapygidae.

Iapygidae (i-a-pij'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Iapyx (-yg-) + -idae.] A family of thysanurous insects, represented by the genus Iapyx, having a pair of anal forceps instead of bristles, and no movable appendages along the under side of the body.

Iapyx (i-ā'piks), n. [NL., < L. Iapyx, < Gr. Iapyx (-yg-), the northwest or rather west-northwest wind, pl. a river in Italy, also Iapyx, the son of Dædalus, the mythical progenitor (eponym) of the Iapyges, L. Iapyges, Gr. Iapyges, a people of southern Italy.] The representative genus of insects of the family Iapygidae. There are several eyeless species. I. solifugus is one of southern Europe, of pale color, about half an inch long; I. gigas of Cyprus is twice as long. A United States species is I. subterraneus, found under stones near the Mammoth Cave in Kentucky.

iarfine, n. [Ir., < iar, after, + fine, family, tribe.] One of the groups of five into which the ancient Irish clans or families were organized. See geilfine.

-iasis. [NL., < L. -iasis, < Gr. -iāsis, as in elephantiasis, elephantiasis, phlebotiasis, phthiriasis, etc., from verbs in -iāo, contr. -iā, the -iā being of the stem, or euphonic.] A termination of New Latin names of diseases, as elephantiasis, phthiriasis, psoriasis, hypochondriasis. Also -asis.

iaspt, n. See jasp, jasper. Spenser.

Iassidæ, Iassus. See Jassidæ, Jassus.

Iastian (i-as'ti-an), n. [Gr. Iastian, Ionic, < Iās, Ionic; see Ionic.] Same as Ionian.

Iatraliptic (i-ā-tra-lip'tik), a. [< Gr. iatraliptēs, a surgeon who practises by anointing, friction, and the like (iatra, anointing, leptēs, such practice), < iatros, a physician, + aleiptēs, an anointer, < aleipein, anoint.] Curing by ointments and frictions.—The iataliptic method, in med., same as epidermic method (which see, under epidermic).

iatic (i-at'rik), a. [< Gr. iatricos, < iatros, a physician, < iastha, cure, heal.] Relating to medicine or physicians.

iaticral (i-at'ri-kal), a. [< iatic + -al.] Same as iatic.

iatrochemical (i-ā-trō-kem'i-kal), a. [< Gr. iatros, a physician, + E. chemical.] Of or pertaining to the chemical theory of medicine: applied to a school of medicine of the seventeenth century which, progressive in its tendencies, applied with a certain exclusiveness and extravagance chemical doctrines to the explanation of physiological and pathological phenomena: opposed to iatrophysical.

iatrochemist (i-ā-trō-kem'ist), n. [< Gr. iatros, a physician, + E. chemist: cf. iatomathematician.] A member of the iatrochemical school.

iatroleptict, iatroleptict, a. Erroneous forms of iataliptic.

iatology (i-ā-trol'ō-jī), n. [< Gr. iatrolōgia, the study of medicine, < iatros, a physician, + -logia, < λέγειν, speak; see -ology.] A treatise on medicine or on physicians; also, the science of medicine.

iatomathematical (i-ā-trō-math-ē-mat'i-kal), a. [< Gr. iatros, a physician, + E. mathematical. See iatomathematician.] Same as iatrophysical.

Some iatomathematical professors are too superstitious, in my judgment. Burton, Anat. of Mel., p. 276.

iatomathematician (i-ā-trō-math'ē-mā-tish'an), n. [< Gr. iatros, a physician, + E. mathematician, after Gr. iatro-mathematikoi, pl., those who practised medicine in conjunction with astrology, < iatros, a physician, + mathematikos, a mathematician.] A member of the iatrophysical school.

iatromechanical (i-ā-trō-mē-kan'i-kal), a. [< Gr. iatros, a physician, + E. mechanical.] Same as iatrophysical.

iatrophysical (i-ā-trō-fiz'i-kal), a. [< Gr. iatros, a physician, + E. physical.] A term applied to a school of physicians which took its rise in Italy in the seventeenth century. They sought to explain the functions of the body and the application of remedies by statical and hydraulic laws, and were eager students of anatomy, since it was only by accurate knowledge of all the parts that they could apply their mathematical and dynamical principles.

I-beam (i'bēm), n. Any form of rolled iron having a cross-section resembling the letter I.

ibent. An obsolete form of *been*¹, past participle of *be*¹.

Iberian¹ (i-bē'ri-an), a. and n. [< L. Iberia, Hiberia, < Gr. Iβηρία, the ancient Greek name of Spain, < Iβηρες, L. Ibères, Hibères, sometimes Ibēri, Hibēri, the inhabitants of Spain.] 1. a. 1. Of or pertaining to ancient Iberia in Europe, which included Spain and Portugal and part of southern France: as, the Iberian peninsula.

Roving the Celtic and Iberian fields.

Milton, Comus, I, 60.

2. Of or pertaining to the inhabitants of Iberia; specifically, in art, noting the productions of the earlier races of the Spanish peninsula, which show no trace of Roman influence.

II. n. 1. One of the primitive inhabitants of Spain. The Basques are supposed to be descendants of the ancient Spanish Iberians.—2. The language of the ancient Iberians, of which modern Basque is supposed to be the representative.

Iberian² (i-bē'ri-an), a. [< L. Iberia, Hiberia, < Ibères, Hibères, Gr. Iβηρες, the ancient inhabitants of the region now called Georgia.] Of or pertaining to ancient Iberia in Asia, nearly corresponding to Georgia in Russian Transcaucasia.

From . . . Margiana to the Hyrcanian cliffs Of Caucasus, and dark Iberian dales.

Milton, P. R., iii, 818.

Iberideæ (i-bē-rid'ē-ē), n. pl. [NL., < Iberis (-id-) + -eæ.] A tribe of cruciferous plants, typified by the genus Iberis, now referred to the tribe Thlaspidæ.

Iberis (i-bē'ris), n. [NL., < Gr. Iβηρίς, a kind of pepperwort, prob. < Iβηρία, Iberia, Spain, as its place of growth.] A genus of cruciferous plants, consisting of annual, perennial, and shrubby species, distinguished by having the two outer petals larger than the others. About 20 species are known, mostly natives of the Mediterranean region and of the East. Several species are cultivated in gardens, under the name of candytuft. The I. amara, or bitter candytuft, is found growing wild in the south of England. The root, stems, and leaves possess medicinal properties, but the seeds are most efficacious. It is said to have been used by the ancients in cases of rheumatism, gout, and other diseases. I. umbellata is the purple candytuft.

Candytuft (Iberis umbellata). a, flower; b, fruit; c, seed.

iberite (i-bē'rit), n. [< L. Iberia, Spain, + *-ite*².] A hydrated altered iolite found in the Spanish province of Toledo.

ibex (i'beks), n. [< L. ibex, a kind of goat, the chamois.] 1. A wild goat, the bouquetin, steinbok, or other species of the genus Ibex. There are several different species, inhabiting mountain-ranges of Europe, Asia, and Africa, the best-known of which, and the one to which the name was originally given, is the steinbok or bouquetin of the Alps and Apennines, Capra ibex or Ibex ibex. The male is about 4½ feet long, and 2 feet 8 inches high at the shoulders; it sometimes attains a weight of 200 pounds. The color is brownish or reddish-gray in summer, and gray in winter. The horns are very large (sometimes 3 feet along the curve), closely approxi-

Alpine Ibex or Steinbok (Capra ibex).

mated at the base, diverging regularly to the tip, curved sharply backward and outward, and longitudinally ridged on each side, the flattened front between the ridges being crossed with many transverse ridges or nodes. It has a short dark beard, and the ears and tail are partly white. The female is smaller, of a gray color, and its horns are shorter and more like those of the domestic goat. The kids are gray. The ibex of the Pyrenees is a closely related species, Ibex pyrenaica; its horns are more divergent for some distance and then incurved at the tip, presenting when viewed together from the front a resemblance to a lyre; each horn is compressed, and keeled in front. See ceagrus.

2. [cap.] A genus of ibexes, or a subgenus of Capra.

ibid. An abbreviation of ibidem.

Ibidæ (i'bi-dē), n. pl. [NL.] Same as Ibididae.
ibidem (i-bi'dēm), adv. [L., in the same place, < ibi, there (< i, pronominal root as in i-s, that, he (see hel), + -bi, dat. or locative ending as in ti-bi: see bi-1, be-1, by-1), + -dem, a demonstrative suffix as in i-dem, the same, etc.] In the same place; at the place or in the book already mentioned: used in order to avoid the repetition of references. Commonly abbreviated to ibid., or ib.

Ibides (i'bi-dēz), n. pl. [L., pl. of Ibis, q. v.] A series of altricial gallatorial birds, a sub-order of Herodiones or Pelargomorphæ, corresponding to the Hemiglottides of Nitzsch, and composed of the two families Ibididae and Platidae, or the ibises and spoonbills. They have a schizorhinal skull, with produced and recurved mandibular angle; a sternum double-notched on each side; the carotids double; two normal intestinal caeca; an extremely small tongue; an ambiens muscle; a tufted oil-gland; no pulvilli; tarsal reticulate (rarely scutellate); the hallux not completely insistent; the middle claw scarcely or not at all pectinate; and the sides of the upper mandible deeply grooved for its whole length. The Ibides are one of three series of Herodiones, the others being the Herodii proper, or herons, and the Ciconiæ, or storks. The genera and species are numerous. Also Ibidides.

Ibididae (i-bid'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Ibis (Ibid) + -idae.] One of two families of Ibides, of the order Herodiones; the ibises. They have a long, slender, subcylindric, and decurved bill, deeply grooved on the sides of the upper mandible, and resembling a curlew's. There are about 24 species, differing much in minor details of structure, so that they have been made types of almost as many genera. See Ibis. Also Ibidæ.

Ibidides (i-bid'i-dēz), n. pl. Same as Ibides. ibidine (i'bi-din), a. [L. ibis (ibid) + -ine.] Having the character of an ibis; of or pertaining to the Ibides. Encyc. Brit., III, 713.

Ibidorhynchus (i'bi-dō-ring'kus), n. [NL., < Gr. ibis (ibid), ibis, + rhynch, bill.] A notable genus of curlews, of the family Scolopacidae: so called from the likeness of the bill to that of an ibis. I. struthersi of Asia is the only species. G. R. Gray, 1844. Originally written Ibidorhyncha. N. A. Vigors, 1831.

ibigau, ibijau (ib'i-gou, -jou), n. The native name of the earth-eater, giant night-jar, or grand goatsucker of South America, Nyctibius grandis, a bird of the family Caprimulgidae. See Nyctibius.

-ibility. The termination of abstract nouns formed in -ity from adjectives in -ible, as in credibility, legibility, etc., from credible, legible, etc. It is properly the double suffix -ibility, with a preceding original or euphonic vowel i. Compare -ability, and see -bility.

ibis (i'bis), n. [= F. Sp. ibis = It. ibi, < L. ibis, < Gr. ibis, < Egyptian origin.] 1. A bird of the family Ibididae, or of the genus Ibis in a wide sense. There are about 24 species, of numerous modern genera, chiefly inhabitants of the lakes and swamps of the warmer parts of the globe. They resemble herons, storks, and other large altricial gallatorial birds. They feed on fish, reptiles, and other animals, chiefly aquatic, nest on the ground or in trees or bushes, lay a few eggs of a uniform color, and rear their young in the nest. The most notable species, and the one to which the name ibis appears originally to have been given, is the sacred ibis of Egypt and other parts of Africa (Ibis religiosa), an object of veneration among the old Egyptians, is the most nearly cosmopolitan species, inhabiting chiefly the old world, but straying to North America, and reaching cold-temperate latitudes in both hemispheres. It is iridescent with green and black, varied by opaque dark-chestnut tints. The white-faced glossy ibis, Ibis guarana, is a related species abundant in warm parts of America, and found in the southwestern United States. The white ibis, Eudocimus albus, inhabits the southern United States, where it is known as the Spanish curlew. The plumage of the adult is pure white, with black-tipped wings. A splendid species of tropical and subtropical America is the scarlet ibis, Eudocimus ruber, which when adult is scarlet, with black-tipped wings. Many of the other species present equally notable characters, as the Australian straw-necked ibis (Geronticus or Corphibis spinicollis), the African (Geronticus (Hagedashia) hagedash), the white Japanese (Geronticus (Nipponia) nippon), etc.

2. [cap.] [NL.] The leading genus of the family Ibididae, formerly more than coextensive with the family, but successively restricted to various generic types of ibises. Its current uses are now for that group which the sacred ibis typifies, and for that of which the scarlet ibis is the type. Modern genera which have been detached from the old genus Ibis are Falcinellus of Bechstein, Geronticus, Eudocimus, Harpiprion, Theisticus, Phimosus, Cercibis of Wagler, Threskiornis of G. R. Gray, Pseudibis of Hodgson, Hagedashia of Bonaparte, Leucibis, Carphibis, Lophotibis, Comatibis, Molypodopha, Bostrychia, Nipponia of Reichenbach, and others.

3. Some bird like an ibis, or supposed to be an ibis, as a wood-ibis or wood-stork. See Tantala.

Ibla (ib'lā), n. [NL.] A genus of cirripeds of the order Thoracica and family Pollicipidae. It is related to Scalpellum; in both genera some species are dioecious, while others present the unique combination of males with hermaphrodites.

Ibles, n. See Eblis.

Iblidæ (ib'li-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Ibla + -idae.] A family of cirripeds, named from the genus Ibla. Originally written Ibladæ. W. E. Leach, 1825.

Ibtyer (i-bik'tēr), n. [NL., < Gr. ibtyer, in Cretan, one who begins a war-song.] A South American genus of vulturine hawks, of the subfamily Polyborinae, family Falconidae, having the nostrils circular, the head partly denuded, the tail normal, and the coloration chiefly black. It is related to Dagryus, Mibago, Senex, and Phalacrocorax. The type is the so-called gallinaceous eagle, Falco aquilinus, now called Ibtyer americanus, which is black with white abdomen and thighs, eyes and bare parts of head red, and blue cere; its length is about 194 inches. (Vieillot, Analyse d'une Nouvelle Ornith. (1816), p. 22.) Gymnops is a synonym. Also written Ibtyer. Raup, 1845.

Ibtyer americanus.

-ic. [Formerly -ick, -ik, often -ique, < ME. -ik; = F. -ique = Sp. -ico, It. -ico (cf. D. G. -isch = Dan. -isk), < L. -icus = Gr. -ικος, a term, consisting of the stem-vowel -i- (original or supplied: see -i 2) + formative -co = Gr. -κο, + nom. ending -s = Gr. -ς; = Goth. -a-gs = AS. -ig, E. -y, q. v.] 1. An adjective termination of Latin or Greek origin, very common in adjectives taken from Latin or Greek, as in public, metallic, etc., and also much used in modern formations, as artistic, electric, etc. Such words, derived from or modeled upon Latin or Greek adjectives, may be also or exclusively nouns, as public, mythic, logic, music. In Middle English this termination was usually written -ik or -ike; and from an early period down to the nineteenth century the form -ick (classick, critick, musicick, ethicks, mathematicks, etc.) was used, some dictionaries retaining it till about 1840.

2. In chem., a suffix denoting a higher state of oxidation than the termination -ous, as ferric hydrate, distinguished from ferrous hydrate, phosphoric anhydrid, distinguished from phosphorous anhydrid, etc.

Icacina (i-kā-si'nā), n. [NL., prob. dim. of Sp. icaco.] A small genus of diotyledonous polypetalous plants, of the natural order Oleaceae, type of the tribe Iceaceae. They have a 5-lobed or 5-parted calyx; 5 hypogynous valvate petals; 5 stamens with filiform filaments, alternate with the petals, and inserted on a hypogynous disk; and a 1-celled, 2-seeded ovary. They are evergreen shrubs, with ascending or climbing branches and smooth leaves. Three or four species only are known, natives of tropical Africa.

Iceacinaeæ (i-kas-i-nā' sē-ē), n. pl. [NL., < Iceacina + -aeae.] An order of plants, the genera of which are now referred to the Oleaceae, tribe Iceaceae. See Iceacinaeæ.

Iceacinae (i-kā-sin' ē-ē), n. pl. [NL., < Iceacina + -aeae.] A tribe of plants of the natural order Oleaceae, typified by the genus Iceacina. The members are evergreen trees and shrubs, and are not known to be of any special use. They are natives of the tropical and subtropical regions of the old world.

icaco (i-kak' ō), n. [Sp. Amer.] The cocopalum, Chrysobalanus Icaco, a native of Florida and the West Indies. It is a shrub 4 to 6 feet high, with fruit about the size of a plum, which is white, yellow, red, or purple in color. It forms a favorite conserve in the Spanish West Indian colonies.

-ical. [L. -ic-al-is, more common in NL.: see -ic and -al.] A compound adjective termination, usually equivalent to the simple -ic, as hysterical, hysterical, but often slightly differentiated, as in comic, comic-al, historical, historical, political, political. When the form in -ic is used chiefly or exclusively as a noun (either in singular or in plural form), the adjective is regularly in -ic-al: as, critical, critical, musical, musical, logical, logical, political, etc. Adverbs formed from adjectives regularly ending in -ic, but which may have -ical, regularly take -al before -ly: as, graphic, graphic-al-ly; intrinsic, intrinsic-al-ly. See -ic and -al.

Icarian (i-kā'ri-an), a. and n. [L. Icarus, Gr. Ἰκαρος, pertaining to Icarus [L. Icaria, Gr. Ἰκαρία, Icaria], < Ἰκαρος, Icarus in Greek legend, a son of Dædalus: see def.] 1. a. 1. Pertaining or relating to Icarus, the son of Dædalus, who, to escape the wrath of Minos, is fabled in Greek legend to have fled from Crete with his father on wings fastened on with wax. In defiance of his father's warning, he flew too high; the sun melted the wax, and he fell into the Aegean sea, between the Cyclades and Caria, hence known as the Icarian sea; hence applied to any foolhardy or presumptuous exploit or enterprise.

High-bred thoughts disdain to take their flight,
But on th' Icarian wings of babbling fame.

Quarles, Emblems, l. 9.

2. (a) Relating to Icarus or Icaria, now Nikaria, an island in the Icarian sea, near Samos. (b) Of or relating to Icaria, a deme of Attica occupying a valley behind Pentelicon, noted as the home of Thespis, the reputed founder of Greek tragedy, and as the traditional birthplace of the drama and of the cult of Dionysus in Attica.—3. Pertaining or relating to Icaria, an imaginary country where an ideally perfect communism prevailed, described in the work "Voyage to Icaria" (Voyage en Icarie), published by the French communist Étienne Cabet in 1840; pertaining or relating to the principles set forth in this work. An Icaria was established by Cabet and a few hundred followers in 1849 at Nauvoo in Illinois (after a failure in Texas in 1848), which, after some dissensions and divisions, was removed to Adams county, Iowa, in 1857. Another community was established in Sonoma county, California, in 1881, under the name of Icaria-Speranza. Their number has always been small.

The Icarian system is as nearly as possible a pure democracy. The president, elected for a year, is simply an executive officer to do the will of the majority.

Nordhoff, Communist Societies of the U. S.

II. n. 1. An inhabitant of Icaria.—2. A follower of the communist Cabet; a settler in an Icarian commune.

The Icarians reject Christianity; but they have adopted the communist idea as their religion. This any one will see who speaks with them. But devotion to this idea has supported them under the most deplorable poverty and long-continued hardship for twenty years.

Nordhoff, Communist Societies of the U. S.

Icarianism (i-kā'ri-an-izm), n. [L. Icarian + -ism.] The communist system described by Étienne Cabet as existing in Icaria (see Icarian, a., 3), and advocated by him.

The apostles of Icarianism should, like Christ, whose principles they were only carrying out, convert the world by teaching, preaching, writing, discussing, persuading, and by setting good examples.

R. T. Ely, French and German Socialism, p. 50.

icaryt, n. [Russ. ikra, dial. ikro (= Pol. Serv. OBulg. ikra = Bohem. ikra = Lith. ikrai = Lett. ikra = Hung. ikra), roe, caviar.] Caviar.

Of the Roers of these four kinds they make very great store of Icary or Caucary. Hakluyt's Voyages, l. 479.

icchet, v. i. An obsolete spelling of itch. Chaucer.

iccle, n. See icicle.

sarn; but evidence is lacking: see iron.] 1. The solid form of water, produced by freezing. It is a brittle, transparent solid, with a refractive index of 1.3. Water, under ordinary conditions, begins to freeze at 32° F. (0° C.), and in freezing expands by about $\frac{1}{10}$ of its bulk, exerting a great force against any surface by which it is confined. The specific gravity of ice is nearly 0.92, and hence it floats on the water with about $\frac{9}{10}$ of its volume submerged. The temperature of freezing is lowered .0075° C. for every atmosphere of pressure. Freezing is retarded by substances in solution; thus, seawater freezes at about 27° F. (−3° C.). Ice is produced in unlimited quantities by the processes of nature in cold climates. It may also be made artificially by ice-machines of various kinds. See ice-machine.

His wif walked him with, with a longe gode . . .
Barfote on the bare fies that the blod folwede.

Piers Plowman's Creed (E. E. T. S.), l. 436.

I finde no peace and yet me warre is done,

Sci. Amer. Supp., p. 8761.

Ice age, the period, more generally designated as the glacial epoch (see glacial), during which there was a much more extensive development of ice over certain portions of the earth's surface than there is at the present time. It is generally supposed that the glacial epoch occurred in post-Tertiary times, but some geologists maintain that there have been numerous repetitions of this condition.

—Ice system, a system of glaciers radiating from one common center or ice-cap: a term used by some geologists to distinguish regions where the glaciation has diverged from several independent centers from those where it has all moved in one direction, and in the main independently of the topographical features of the country.

Under such circumstances, Wales, Scotland, and Scandinavia must have had their own ice-systems.

In practice the termination is historically a feminine form of -ic.

ice-anchor (is'ang'kor), n. Naut., an anchor with one arm, used for securing a vessel to a floe of ice.

The ordinary ice-anchor was a large iron hook bent nearly at a right angle, with a point to be inserted in a hole in the ice.

Schley and Soley, Rescue of Greeley, p. 155.

ice-apron (is'a'prun), n. An ice-breaker or starling placed on the up-stream side of a bridge-pier to protect it from moving ice.

ice-auger (is'á'gér), n. An implement for boring ice, in ice-fishing, which has superseded the ordinary ice-chisel. It bores a 6-inch hole, cutting out a plug of ice of that diameter.

ice-ax (is'aks), n. An ax for cutting or cleaving ice; especially, an ax used by alpine guides and alpinists generally for cutting steps in making the ascent of steep ice-slopes. The ax is carried sometimes as a part of the alpenstock, and sometimes as an entirely separate implement. The forms in use are much varied.

ice-bag (is'bag), n. A caoutchouc bag for holding broken ice when used as a cold application in surgical treatment, especially for the eye, spine, etc.

ice-banner (is'ban'ér), n. See ice-feathers.

ice-beam (is'bém), n. Naut., a plank or beam used to strengthen the stem and bows of ships when exposed to the concussion and pressure of ice.

ice-bearer (is'bär'ér), n. In physics, a cryophorus.

ice-belt (is'belt), n. Same as ice-foot.

On regaining the seaboard, the same frowning cliffs and rock-covered ice-belt that we had left greeted us.

Kane, Sec. Grinnell Exp., I. 96.

iceberg (is'bér), n. [= D. ijsberg = G. eisberg; adapted from Scand., < Sw. Norw. isberg = Dan. isberg, lit. 'ice-hill': see ice and berg.] An elevated floating mass of ice detached from a glacier at the sea-level. The movement of the glacier downward causes it to protrude into the sea, by which it is in part supported until the weight becomes so great that more or less of it breaks off, often with great noise and commotion of the sea. This process is called calving. The portion detached from the glacier floats about, driven by winds and currents, and is an iceberg. This is the mode of formation of the best-known bergs—those which often encumber a part of the North Atlantic in spring and early summer, having come down from the ice-clad ranges and high plateaus of Greenland. The more or less completely frozen surface of the water in the northern polar region is known as pack-ice, or simply pack, floe-ice, floe, and floe-berg. (See floe and floe-berg.) In regard to the icebergs of the Southern Ocean, it is not known with certainty whether they are all glacier-born, or whether they are not in large part the result of the direct freezing of the sea-water.

ice-bird (is'bér), n. The little auk or sea-dove, Mergulus alle, or Alle nigricans. See cut under dovekie.

ice-blink (is'blingk), n. A peculiar appearance in the air caused by the reflection of light from the surface of an ice-pack or floating mass of ice, or from land covered with snow. By it the presence of ice may often be recognized at a distance of 20 miles or more.

An ice-blink all along the horizon to leeward, indicating the situation of the pack.

R. M'Cormick, Arctic and Antarctic Voyages, I. 272.

ice-boat (is'bót), n. 1. A strong boat, propelled by steam, used to break a channel through ice.—2. A triangular or boat-shaped frame mounted on runners, and fitted with a mast, sails, etc., for sailing on ice. Two of the runners are placed at the ends of a runner-plank extending across the frame at the point of its greatest beam, and the third is carried on a pivot at the stern and serves as a rudder.

ice-bone (is'bón), n. One of the numerous varieties of aitchbone.

ice-box (is'boks), n. 1. An ice-chest; a small refrigerator.—2. The compartment in a refrigerator or an ice-chest for containing the ice.

ice-breaker (is'brá'kér), n. 1. A structure of masonry or timber (as a pier or row of piles) for the protection of bridge-piers or of vessels in dock from moving ice.—2. An ice-boat for runners are placed at the ends of a runner-plank extending across the frame at the point of its greatest beam, and the third is carried on a pivot at the stern and serves as a rudder.

ice-bone (is'bón), n. One of the numerous varieties of aitchbone.

ice-box (is'boks), n. 1. An ice-chest; a small refrigerator.—2. The compartment in a refrigerator or an ice-chest for containing the ice.

ice-breaker (is'brá'kér), n. 1. A structure of masonry or timber (as a pier or row of piles) for the protection of bridge-piers or of vessels in dock from moving ice.—2. An ice-boat for breaking channels through ice in a river or harbor.—3. The bowhead, or great polar whale, Balaena mysticetus: a whalers' name.

ice-brook (is'brúk), n. An ice-cold brook or stream. "The allusion [in the extract] is to the ancient Spanish custom of hardening steel by plunging it red-hot in the rivulet Salo near Bilbilis [now Calatayud in Aragon]." (Schmidt.) [Rare.]

I have another weapon in this chamber,

It is a sword of Spain, the ice-brook's temper.

Shak., Othello, v. 2.

ice-built (is'bilt), a. Built or composed of ice.

Where shaggy forms o'er ice-built mountains roam.

Gray, Progress of Poesy.

ice-calorimeter (is'kal-ō-rim'e-tér), n. See calorimeter.

ice-canoë (is'ka-nō'), n. A boat with a very broad flat keel shod with iron runners, so that it can be drawn readily over the ice: intended for use on partly frozen lakes and rivers.

ice-cap (is'kap), n. 1. A general or continuous permanent covering of a certain area of land, whether large or small, with snow, névé, or ice, especially in the arctic regions. The continuous covering with snow and névé of the higher and larger part of Greenland is sometimes called the ice-cap, but more generally the inland ice.

A decided ice-cap was observed above the land at Newman Bay, also one inshore of Cape Britannia, far away towards the north-east.

Nares, Voyage to the Polar Sea, II. 72.

2. In therap., a rubber bag containing ice for application to the head.

ice-chair (is'chär), n. A chair set on runners like a sled, in which a person is propelled on the ice, usually by a skater.

ice-chest (is'chest), n. A form of domestic ice-chamber having apartments for the ice and the provisions, the food-chamber being cooled by air conducted to it from the ice-box, or by the cold side of the latter, which forms a part of the inclosure of the food-chamber; a refrigerator. E. H. Knight.

ice-chisel (is'chiz'el), n. An implement used, especially by anglers in ice-fishing, for cutting holes in ice. See ice-auger.

The ice-chisel, . . . called by the Eskimos too'-oke.

Sciences, IV. 82.

ice-claw (is'klä), n. An appliance for grasping blocks of ice.

ice-closet (is'kloz'et), n. A large refrigerator, or a small room for cold storage.

ice-cold (is'köld), a. [*ME. iscold, < AS. is-ceald = D. ijs-koud = G. eiskalt = Dan. iskold, Sw. iskall], < is, ice, + ceald, cold.] 1. Cold as ice; extremely cold.—2. In pathol., experiencing a morbid sensation of cold, compared by the patient to that which would be produced by the application of ice. Dunglison.

ice-cream (is'krēm'), n. [Strictly iced cream.] A confection made by congealing variously flavored cream or custard in a vessel surrounded with a freezing-mixture.

The Deacon, not being in the habit of taking his nourishment in the congealed state, had treated the ice-cream as a pudding of a rare species.

O. W. Holmes, Elsie Venner, vii.

Ice-cream fork, a small table-fork, broad and with short tines, for eating ice-cream.—Ice-cream freezer, an apparatus for making ice-cream, consisting of a can or metallic vessel plunged in a tub or cylindrical casing filled with broken ice and salt. The contents of the vessel are stirred or whirled about by means of a dasher, or by rotation.—Rock ice-cream. Same as granite.

ice-crusher (is'krush'ér), n. A device for grinding or crushing ice.

iced (ist), p. a. 1. Covered with ice; converted into ice; frozen.—2. Cooled with ice; very cold: as, iced tea; iced wine.—3. Covered with concreted sugar; frosted: as, iced cake.—4. In bot., covered with particles like icicles.

ice-drift (is'drift), n. Masses of loose or floating ice.

The strait was already filled with ice-drift.

Molloy, United Netherlands, III. 557.

ice-drops (is'drops), n. pl. In bot., transparent processes resembling icicles.

ice-elevator (is'el'e-vä-tor), n. A hoisting-apparatus for lifting blocks of ice from the water to the ice-house. The most common form is an inclined plane extending from under the water to the top gallery of the ice-house. On the incline travel two endless chains, with bars joining them at intervals. Cakes of ice floated up to the foot of the elevator are caught by Ice-claw.

these bars and dragged up the incline. Arrangements are also made for diverting the ice to any level of the house. Another form, sometimes called an ice-screw, consists of an inclined plane in the form of a spiral. In the well of the spiral is an upright shaft having radial arms; as the shaft revolves these engage the blocks of ice, and push them up the spiral incline to the ice-house.

Ice-elevator.

ice-escape (is'es-kāp'), n. An apparatus consisting of poles and ropes for rescuing persons who have broken through the ice.

A number of sledge-chairs and an ice-escape were conveyed to the place of amputation.

Illus. London News, Jan. 9, 1864.

ice-fall (is'fāl), n. 1. The dislodgment and fall of masses from a glacier, or from a floating iceberg.

And then the ice-fall with its ringing, rumbling, crashing roar, and the heavy, explosion-like voice of the final plunge, followed by the wild, frantic dashing of the waters.

New York Independent, April 22, 1862.

2. A glacier. [Poetical.]

Ye ice-falls! ye that from the mountain's brow
Adown enormous ravines slope again. . .
Motionless torrents! silent cataracts!

Coleridge, Hymn in the Vale of Chamouni.

ice-feathers (is'fēn'ēr), n. pl. Peculiar feather-like forms assumed by ice, occasionally seen on and near the summits of high mountains, and especially on Mount Washington in New Hampshire. Under certain exceptional conditions of the weather the surface at times becomes covered with a considerable thickness of ice, parts of which assume a more or less distinctly marked feathery appearance. This feathery incrustation manifests itself especially on the edges of rocks, buildings, and projections of all kinds, from which elongated masses of crystals sometimes project with slight fan-like divergence for a distance of two or three feet, pointing in the direction from which the wind was blowing at the time of their formation. This phenomenon has been called frost-feathers, frostwork, and icework; and those who have observed it as exhibited on Lassen's Peak in California have named it ice-banner.

ice-fern (is'fēr), n. A fern-like incrustation of ice or hoar frost produced on the glass of windows by the freezing of insensible moisture.

Fine as ice-ferns on January panes.

Tennyson, Aylmer's Field.

ice-field (is'fēld), n. A great sheet or floe of ice, at times so extensive in arctic seas that its limits cannot be seen from the masthead.

The final breaking up of the ice in the Missouri was one of excitement to us. The roar and crash of the ice-fields could be heard a great distance.

E. B. Custer, Boots and Saddles, p. 229.

ice-fishing (is'fish'ing), n. The act or method of fishing through holes cut in the ice, usually with hook and line. The most common mode of ice-fishing is by means of the tilter or tilt-up. See tilter.

ice-float (is'floit), n. Same as ice-floe.

ice-floe (is'flo), n. [= Dan. isflage, isflag = Norw. isflak, isflake, isflok = Sw. isflake, < is, ice, + flage, Norw. flake, floe: see ice and flake, flaw, floe.] A large sheet of floating ice.

ice-foot (is'füt), n. A belt of ice, in northern seas, built up chiefly by the accumulation of the autumn snowfall, which becomes converted into ice when it meets the sea-water, and thus forms a solid wall from the bottom of the sea upward, increasing in height as the snow accumulates. The upper surface is level with the top of high water, and the bottom of the ice-cliff is at the low-water level. Also called ice-belt, ice-ledge, and ice-wall.

The separation of the true ice-foot from our foe was at first a simple interval, which by the recession and advance of the tides gave a movement of about six feet to our brig.

Kane, Sec. Grinnell Exp., I. 162.

The usual mode of travel is by dog-sleds along the ice-foot which everywhere skirts the land.

Schley and Soley, Rescue of Greely, p. 200.

icé-fork (is'fōrk), n. A three-tined fork of special pattern, used for picking ice into fragments before it is ground fine in an ice-crusher. Such a fork, as used in the fisheries, has tapering tines about 1 inch wide and from 6 to 9 inches long, united above, and fitted with a socket for a wooden handle 4 or 5 feet long.

ice-fox (is'foks), n. The isatis or arctic fox, Vulpes lagopus.

ice-glass (is'glās), n. Same as crackle-glass.

ice-gull (is'gul), n. 1. The glaucous gull or burgomaster, Larus glaucus. See cut under burgomaster.—2. The ivory-gull. Coves.

ice-hill (is'hil), n. [< ice + hill, translating iceberg, q. v.] Same as iceberg. [Rare.]

ice-hook (is'hük), n. 1. A hook attached to a pole, used in moving blocks of ice.—2. A small ice-anchor.

ice-house (is'hous), n. [= Dan. ishus; as ice + house.] A structure, usually with double walls, packed between with sawdust or some similar non-conducting material, used for the storage of ice. It usually incloses a pit or well, which has a drain to carry off the water resulting from the melting of the ice. A year's supply of ice for private use is often kept in a small ice-house constructed on this principle, sometimes partly or wholly underground. Ice-houses for supplying the trade in ice are commonly placed close to a lake or stream, and fitted with elevators and other appliances for gathering, storing, and shipping the ice. The term is sometimes, but less properly, applied to cold-storage rooms and large refrigerators.

Considering at how little expense and trouble an ice-house can be constructed, it is surprising that any respectable habitation in the country should not have one attached to it.

Ure, Dict., II. 878.

Ice. An abbreviation of Icelandic.

Iceland† (is'land), n. [Also Island; abbr. of Iceland dog, q. v.] An Iceland dog.

Our water-dogs and Islands here are shorn.

White hair of women here so much is worn.

Drayton, Mooncalf.

Iceland crystal. See crystal.

Iceland cur† (is'land kër). Same as Iceland dog. Erroneously, Isling cur.

Hang hair like hemp, or like the Isling curs;

For never powder, not the crisping iron;

Shall touch these dangling locks.

Fletcher (and another), Queen of Corinth, iv. 1.

Iceland dog† (is'land dog). [Also Island (Island, Isling) dog (or cur), also simply Iceland (Island, etc.); supposed to have been brought from Iceland.] A sort of shaggy, sharp-eared white dog, formerly imported, or supposed to be imported, from Iceland as a lap-dog.

Pish for thee, Iceland dog! thou prick-ear'd cur of Iceland.

Shak., Hen. V., ii. 1.

Use and custome hath intertained other dogges of an outlandishe kinde, but a few, and the same beying of a pretty bygnesse; I meane Island dogges, curled and rough all over, which by reason of the length of their heare make shewe neither of face nor of body. And yet these curres forsoothe, because they are so strange, are greatly set by, esteemed, taken up, and made of, many times in the roome of the spaniell gentle or comforter.

A. Fleming, tr. of Caius on English Dogs (1576). (Nares.)

Icelander (is'lan-dër), n. [= Dan. Islænder, Sw. Isländer (Isel. Islænder); as Iceland (< ME. Island, Island, < Ice. Island (Sw. and Dan. Island = D. Island = G. Island), < iss, ice, + land, land: so called by the first Scandinavian explorers, from the polar ice which filled the fords) + -er.]. A native or an inhabitant of Iceland.

Iceland falcon, gull. See falcon, gull.

Icelandic (is'lan'dik), a. and n. [< NL. Isländicus; the analogical E. form would be "Icelandish" = Ice. Islenzkr = Sw. Dan. Isländsk.]

I. a. Pertaining to Iceland, a large island belonging to Denmark, in the northernmost part of the Atlantic ocean, east of Greenland.

II. n. The language of the Icelanders or of their literature. It is the oldest and best-preserved member of the Scandinavian branch of the Teutonic family of languages. In its older form, called Old Norse, it stands as the type of the general Scandinavian speech as first recorded (tenth and eleventh centuries), of which Norwegian, Swedish, and Danish are the modern continental forms. Modern Icelandic dates from the Reformation; it preserves in great part the external form of the Old Icelandic, with considerable changes in pronunciation and vocabulary. Many important historical, poetical, theological, and other works have been written in Icelandic, from the tenth century to the present time. Abbreviated Ice.

Iceland moss, spar, etc. See the nouns.

ice-leaf (is'lef), n. Mullen, Verbasum Thapsus.

ice-ledge (is'lejd), n. Same as ice-foot.

ice-leveler (is'lev'el-ër), n. An implement used in clearing and cleaning the surface of ice previous to sawing and gathering.

ice-loon (is'lön), n. The great northern diver, Columbus glacialis or torguatus.

ice-machine (is'mā-shēn'), n. A machine for the artificial production of ice. Ice-machines are based on one or the other of two general principles, or on a combination of the two, namely, the principle of the absorption of the latent heat of vaporization or of liquefaction from surrounding or contiguous bodies by substances which evaporate or liquefy at low temperatures, and the principle of the conversion of heat into work by the expansion of previously compressed and cooled gas or vapor, in such manner that the work performed is expended upon another isolated volume of the same material which this work assists in compressing for subsequent use in expansion. The prime mover is usually a steam-engine. The compressed gas or vapor is led into and expanded in a cylinder like that of a steam-engine. In machines employing compressed air, the air is first compressed in and discharged from a compressor cylinder into a receiver. The work of compression is thereby converted into heat in the compressed air. This heat is taken out of the air by various methods, water at ordinary temperatures being generally used for this cooling. The air is next induced to an engine-cylinder, wherein it acts, first at full pressure and then expansively, against a piston so connected that, during the period of expansion, other work is performed at the expense of the heat remaining in the air at the beginning of this period. Heat is thus converted into work, and the temperature of the air passed out of the cylinder is greatly reduced. The cold air is generally passed into a system of pipes surrounded by a saline solution which resists freezing at very low temperatures, and this solution, so refrigerated, is used to freeze water in metal molds set in the cold brine. In ice-cream manufacture the mutual liquefaction of ice and salt takes place at 0° F. when these substances are mixed in proper proportions, and the latent heat of this liquefaction being extracted from the cream, the latter freezes. Ether, ammonia, and sulphur dioxide are the most important substances used in machines which operate upon the first principle. By cooling and compression these substances liquefy. They are then allowed to evaporate and seize heat from saline solutions, which are utilized for ice-making as above described, or which are pumped through systems of piping for cooling storage- and fermenting-rooms. Anhydrous ammonia has proved most efficient for ice-machines, and is now more used than any other material. See refrigerating-machine, under refrigerate.

ice-mallet (is'mal'et), n. A mallet used by fishermen and others to break or crush ice.

iceman (is'man), n.; pl. icemen (-men). 1. A man skilled in traveling upon ice.

The actual deposit of ice upon our decks would have tried the nerves of the most experienced icemen.

Kane, Sec. Grinnell Exp., I. 76.

The glacier [des Bois] maintains this wild and chaotic character for some time; and the best iceman would find himself defeated in an attempt to get along it.

Tyndall, Forms of Water, p. 41.

2. One who is engaged in the industry of gathering and storing ice for commercial or domestic uses; a dealer in ice; also, one who distributes ice to customers.

ice-mark (is'märk), n. In geol., a scratch, groove, or polished surface produced by glacial action or left by a moving mass of ice; any indication of the former presence of ice.

ice-master (is'mäs'tër), n. A pilot or seaman of experience, employed to assist in navigating through ice in the Arctic ocean.

ice-mountain (is'moun'tän), n. Same as iceberg.

Thus are these amazing icemountains launched forth to sea, and found floating in the waters round both poles.

Goldsmith, Hist. Earth (ed. 1790), I. 247.

ice-pack (is'pak), n. A great field of ice, consisting of separate masses packed together or lying closely adjacent to one another, as in the arctic seas.

ice-pail (is'päl), n. A pail or bucket intended to be filled with ice for cooling wine in bottles or decanters. Such a vessel is sometimes made of fine material, as porcelain, is fitted with a lining, cover, etc., and may serve as an ornament for a sideboard.

"This is as it should be," said I, looking round at the well-filled table and the sparkling spirits immersed in the ice-pails.

Bulwer, Pelham, xvii.

ice-paper (is'pä'për), n. Very thin, transparent gelatin in sheets, for copying drawings. Also called papier glacé.

ice-pick (is'pik), n. A small hand-tool, shaped like an awl, used for breaking ice.

ice-pit (is'pit), n. A pit dug in the ground, lined with some non-conducting material, and used for the storage and preservation of ice.

ice-pitcher (is'pich'ër), n. A pitcher for holding iced water, often made of metal, with double or non-conducting walls.

ice-plane (is'plän), n. 1. In ice-harvesting, an implement used in removing roughnesses and irregularities from the surface of ice that is to be cut. It is drawn by horses.—2. A tool for removing snow-ice from the surfaces of ice-blocks before storing them.—3. An instrument for shaving ice from the lump or block for use in the preparation of cooling drinks, etc.

ice-plant (is'plant), n. A plant of the genus Mesembryanthemum, the M. crystallinum, belonging to the natural order Primulacæ. It is sprinkled throughout with pellucid watery vesicles which shine like pieces of ice, and is indigenous in Greece, the Canary Islands, and the Cape of Good Hope; in the Canaries large quantities of the plant are collected and burned, and the ashes are sent to Spain for use in glass-making. It is frequently cultivated. Also called des-plank. The name ice-plant is also applied to Rothia, falcula of the Cruciferae, but less commonly. Monotropa uniflora is sometimes called the American ice-plant, from its white, transparent color.

ice-plow (is'plou), n. An implement for cutting grooves in ice, to divide it into blocks of the right size for harvesting.

a, plow for cutting three parallel grooves in moderately thick ice; b, plow with five shares following in the same groove, for cutting deep ice; c, ice-plow or cutter with guide.

It is usually made with a marker that serves to indicate the position of the next cut, or with a guide that travels in the last cut made by the plow. Sometimes called an ice-cutter, or, if for thin ice, or to make only a slight cut and to be followed by a heavier blow, an ice-marker.

ice-poultice (is'pōl'tis), n. In med., a poultice made by filling a bag or bladder with pounded ice; an ice-bag.

ice-quake (is'kwāk), n. [ice + quake, after earthquake.] The rending and crashing which precede the breaking up of floes of ice.

icer (i'sēr), n. One who ices; specifically, in the fisheries, one who ices fresh fish in the hold of a vessel.

ice-river (is'riv'ēr), n. A fanciful or poetical name for a glacier.

It is indubitable that an ice-river . . . once flowed through the vale of Hasli.

Tyndall, Forms of Water, p. 146.

ice-saw (is'sā), n. A large saw used for cutting through the ice to free ships which have been frozen in, or for cutting ice in blocks for storage.

ice-scraper (is'skrā'pēr), n. An implement for cleaning snow and dirt from the surface of ice before cutting and storing it.

ice-screw (is'skrō), n. See ice-elevator.

ice-sheet (is'shēt), n. A glacial covering or ice-cap extending over a large area of country, as that which is believed by many geologists to have covered much of eastern North America during the glacial period.

An epoch in which the retreating icesheet still occupied the St. Lawrence valley. The American, X. 316.

ice-ship (is'ship), n. A ship fitted for passage through ice.

The first [sealers] are distinctively ice-ships.

Schley and Soley, Rescue of Greely, p. 113.

ice-spade (is'spād), n. A hand-tool used in harvesting ice, to separate the blocks partly cut by the ice-plow.

ice-spar (is'spār), n. A variety of glassy feldspar, the crystals of which resemble ice.

ice-stream (is'strēm), n. 1. A more or less continuous belt or stream of ice-floes driven in a certain direction by wind or current, or both. It is the ice-stream which sweeps around Cape Farewell toward the north, bearing the last remains of the heavy floes formed originally in the polar sea, which is chiefly thus designated.

I found that we had run deeper into the ice-stream than I had intended, and was forced to haul out from five to ten miles farther away from the land.

Nares, Voyage to the Polar Sea, I. 8.

2. A stream-like glacier; a stream of slowly moving ice.

Near the village of Grindelwald, in the Bernese Oberland, there are two great ice-streams called respectively the upper and the lower Grindelwald glaciers.

Tyndall, Forms of Water, p. 98.

ice-table (is'tā'bl), n. A flat, horizontal mass of ice.

ice-tongs (is'tōngz), n. pl. 1. Large iron nippers for handling ice.—2. Small tongs for taking up pieces of ice at table. They are generally made like sugar-tongs, but longer, and with larger claws or grapples.

ice-wall (is'wāl), n. Same as ice-foot. Sometimes, however, an "ice-wall" is formed by the pressure of the pack, which throws masses of ice on to the shore and piles them up to a considerable height in the form of a solid wall. Some of the belts of ice which line the arctic shores are formed in part from the snow derived from the land, and in part from the sea-ice thrown upon the shore by the pressure of the pack.

I secured the ship to a small indentation of the ice-foot or ice-wall. Nares, Voyage to the Polar Sea, II. 115.

ice-water (is'wā'tēr), n. [In the second sense, strictly iced water.] 1. Water from melted ice.—2. Water cooled by ice; iced water.

ice-whale (is'hwāl), n. The bowhead, or great polar whale, Balaena mysticetus; so called by whalemen because its habitat is among the scattered floes, or about the borders of the ice-fields or barriers.

ice-wool (is'wūl), n. Same as cis-wool.

icework (is'wērk), n. See ice-feathers.

ice-worm (is'wōrn), a. Bearing the marks of the former presence of ice; smoothed, polished, grooved, or scratched by the movement of masses of ice containing embedded detritus.

ice-yacht (is'yot'), n. An ice-boat.

ice-yachting (is'yot'ing), n. Sailing with ice-yachts.

ice-yachtsman (is'yots'man), n. One who sails in an ice-yacht.

ich¹, pron. A form of I, the nominative of the first personal pronoun, in the southern dialect of early English, and occasionally found in the midland dialect.

ich², a. and pron. A Middle English form of each.

ich dien (ich dēn). [MHG. G. ich diene, ich dien, I serve: ich = AS. ic = E. I; diene, OHG. diōnō = OS. thionō, serve, connected with OHG. deo = AS. theōw = Goth. thius, m., OHG. diu = OS. thiwi, thiu = AS. theōwe = Goth. thiwi, f., a female servant: see therv².] I serve. This was originally the motto of John of Luxemburg, King of Bohemia, who was killed at the battle of Crécy in France in 1346. It was adopted, together with his crest of three ostrich-feathers, by Edward the Black Prince, who served in that battle, and both have been retained by the Princes of Wales since.

ichiboo, ichibu (ō'chi-bō), n. [Jap., ichi, one, + bū, a division, name of a coin.] See bū.

Ichneumia (ik-nū'mi-ā), n. [NL., Gr. ἰχνημία, ichneumia; cf. ἰχνημία, a track.] 1. An aberrant genus of African ichneumonids or mungooses, of the subfamily Herpestinae and family Viverridae, having a long bushy tail and hairy soles. The type is I. leucura or albicauda. It is of dark-gray color, due to annulation of the hairs with black and white. St. Hilaire, 1837.

2. [l. c.] A species of this genus: as, the white-tailed ichneumia.

ichneumon (ik-nū'mon), n. [L. ichneumon, Gr. ἰχνημων, an Egyptian animal which hunts out crocodiles' eggs, the ichneumon, Pharaoh's rat, lit. the 'tracker' (cf. ἰχνημία, a track), cf. ἰχνημων, track or trace out, hunt after, cf. ἰχνη, a track or footprint.] 1. A carnivorous mammal, a kind of mongoose (Viverra ichneumon of Lin-næus, now known as Herpestes ichneumon), found in Egypt, belonging to the subfamily Herpestinae and family Viverridae. It is of slender form, somewhat like that of the weasel tribe. The body is about 19 inches long, and of a grizzled brownish and yellowish color, due to the annulation of the hairs with different shades; the muzzle and paws are black and the tail is tufted. It feeds on various small mammals, reptiles, or other animals, and has long been noted for devouring crocodiles' eggs, on which account it was held in great regard by the Egyptians. It is easily domesticated, and is useful in destroying vermin. Also called Pharaoh's rat.

Pharaoh's Rat (Herpestes ichneumon).

2. [cap.] A genus of herpestine viverrine mammals, containing the species I. pharaonis. See Herpestes. Lacépède, 1797.—3. In entom.: (a) [cap.] A Linnean genus of hymenopterous insects, formerly including most of the pupivorous or parasitic hymenoptera, now restricted to certain species of ichneumon-flies which are regarded as typical of the genuine Ichneumonidae. (b) A species of the genus Ichneumon or family Ichneumonidae; an ichneumon-fly; a cuckoo-fly.

Ichneumones (ik-nū'mō-nēz), n. pl. [NL., pl. of Ichneumon, 3.] In entom., the ichneumon-flies or Ichneumonides. The group is divided into Ichneumones genuini and Ichneumones adsciti, which correspond respectively with the modern families Ichneumonidae and Braconidae.

ichneumon-fly (ik-nū'mōn-fi), n. A cuckoo-fly or ichneumon. See Ichneumonidae.

Ichneumonidae (ik-nū'mōn-i-dē), n. pl. [NL., cf. Ichneumon + -idae.] A family of Hymenoptera pupivora or parasitic hymenoptera, established by Leach in 1817; the cuckoo-flies, ichneumon-flies, or ichneumons. The family was formerly much more extensive than it is now, having been restricted, by the exclusion of those ichneumons called Adsciti (see Braconidae), to those which have two recurrent nerves in each fore wing. These insects were formerly called Musca triples, on account of the three threads which spring from the abdomen, and Musca vibrans, from their habit of vibrating the antennæ. The genera and species are very numerous, over 8,000 species existing, it is said, in Europe alone. They are all parasitic on other insects, living usually as internal parasites. The abdomen is attached to the hinder extremity of the metathorax, between the bases of the posterior coxæ. The wings are veined, the anterior pair always exhibiting perfect cells. The ovipositor is straight and often exerted. The antennæ are usually thread-like, and are composed of more than 16 joints, with very few exceptions among the smaller species. The perfect insects feed solely on the juices of flowers. Some of them have a very long ovipositor, which is used to insert the eggs into the bodies of those caterpillars which live beneath the bark or in the crevices of wood; when not employed, this ovipositor is protected by two slender sheaths that inclose it on each side. Others, which have the ovipositor short, place their eggs in or upon the bodies of caterpillars of easier access; others again in the nests of wasps. See cuts under Cryptus, Ophion, and Pimpla.

ichneumonidan (ik-nū'mōn-i-dan), a. and n. 1. a. Having the characters of the Ichneumonidae.

II. n. An ichneumon-fly or ichneumonid.

ichneumoniform (ik-nū'mōn-i-fōr-mā), a. [L. ichneumon, ichneumon, + forma, form.] Having the form or appearance of an ichneumon-fly.

ichneumonized (ik-nū'mōn-īzd), a. [cf. ichneumon + -ize + -ed.] In entom., infested with ichneumon parasites: applied to the larvæ of insects.

ichneumonology (ik-nū'mō-nol'ō-jī), n. [cf. ichneumon + Gr. -λογία, cf. λέγειν, speak: see -ology.] That department of entomology which is concerned with the study of ichneumon-flies.

ichneumous (ik-nū'mus), a. [cf. ichneumon + -ous.] In entom., parasitic; having the habits of an ichneumon: said of insects which deposit their eggs in or on larvæ, as the Ichneumonidae, Chalcididae, and many others.

ichnite (ik'nīt), n. [Gr. ἰχνη, a track, footprint, + -ite².] A fossil footprint; the fossilized track or trace of an animal: used mostly in compounds: as, ornithichnite, sauroroidichnite, tetrapodichnite. See these words, and cut under footprint.

Ichneocarpus (ik-nō-kār'pus), n. [NL. (so called in ref. to the slender seed-vessel), Gr. ἰχνη, a track, trace, + καρπός, fruit.] A genus of plants of the natural order Apocynaceæ. The species are climbing shrubs, with opposite leaves, and flowers in branched terminal panicles. I. frutescens is a native of Ceylon and Nepal. It is sometimes used in India as a substitute for sarsaparilla. It is cultivated as an ornamental plant.

ichnograph (ik'nō-grāf), n. [See ichnography.] In drawing, a ground-plan. E. H. Knight.

ichnographic (ik'nō-grāf'ik), a. [cf. ichnography + -ic.] Pertaining to ichnography; describing a ground-plan.

ichnographical (ik'nō-grāf'i-kāl), a. [cf. ichnographic + -al.] Same as ichnographic.

ichnography (ik-nō-grāf'i), n. [L. ichnographia, Gr. ἰχνογραφία, a tracing-out, a ground-plan, cf. ἰχνη, a track, trace, + -γραφία, cf. γράφειν, write.] The art of tracing ground-plans; the representation of a ground-plot, or of the site of an object on a horizontal plane.

Ichnography, by which we are to understand the very first design and ordinance of a work or edifice, together with every partition and opening drawn by rule and compass upon the area or floor, by artists often call'd the geometrical plan or plat-form.

Evelyn, Architects and Architecture.

ichnolite (ik'nō-lit), n. [Gr. ἰχνη, a track, footprint, + λίθος, a stone.] A stone presenting the impression of the foot of a fossil animal; a fossil footprint or ichnite. See cut under footprint.

Bones and teeth of the elephant and of the horse have also been found in the sandstone beds above the ichnolites. Science, IV. 273.

ichnolithological (ik-nō-lith-ō-jō-l'ī-kāl), a. Pertaining to ichnolithology; ichnological.

ichnolithology (ik'nō-li-thol'ō-jī), n. [Gr. ἰχνη, a track, footprint, + λίθος, a stone, + -λογία, cf. λέγειν, speak: see -ology.] The science of ichnolites; ichnology.

ichnolitic (ik'nō-lit'ik), a. [cf. ichnolite + -ic.] Having the character of an ichnolite.

ichnological (ik'nō-lōj'i-kāl), a. Pertaining to ichnology; ichnolithological.

ichnology (ik-nol'ō-jī), n. [Gr. ἰχνη, a track, footprint, + -λογία, cf. λέγειν, speak: see -ology.] That branch of paleontology which treats of fossil footprints; the science of fossil footprints; the study of those animals which are known only by their footprints.

ichor (i'kôr), n. [= F. ichor = Sp. icor = Pg. ichor = It. icore, < NL. ichor, < Gr. ichôr, juice, the blood of the gods, the serum of blood, lymph; cf. icquâs, moisture, icquâvew, wet.] 1. In Gr. and Rom. myth., an ethereal fluid believed to supply the place of blood in the veins of the gods.

Upon Diomedes wounding the Gods, there flow'd from the Wound an ichor, or pure kind of Blood, which not bred from Mortal Vians. Addison, Spectator, No. 833.

2. A thin, watery humor, like serum or whey; a thin, watery, acrid discharge from an ulcer, a wound, etc.

Long, snaky locks, stiff with loathsome ichor.

L. Wallace, Ben-Hur, p. 412.

ichoræmia, n. See ichorrhæmia.

ichorose (i'kô-rôs), a. [= F. ichoreux = Sp. It. icoroso; as ichor + -ose.] Full of ichor; ichorous.

ichorous (i'kôr-us), a. [ichor + -ous.] 1. Like ichor; thin; watery; serous.—2. Full of ichor; ichorose.

ichorrhæmia (i'kô-rê-mi-ä), n. [NL., < Gr. ichôr, ichor, + rhêin, flow, + haima, blood.] In pathol., the condition of the blood when contaminated by absorption from a suppurating part. Also spelled ichoræmia.

ichth. An abbreviation of ichthyology.

ichthidin (ik'thi-din), n. [Gr. ichthys, a fish, + -id + -in2.] A nitrogenous substance found in the eggs of cyprinoid fishes.

ichthin (ik'thin), n. [Gr. ichthys, a fish, + -in2.] The nitrogenous constituent of the eggs of cartilaginous fishes. It is closely allied to albumin.

ichthulin (ik'thū-lin), n. [Gr. ichthys, a fish, + uln, matter, + -in2.] A constituent of the eggs of certain fishes, especially cyprinoids, containing from 52.5 to 53.3 per cent. carbon, from 8 to 8.3 hydrogen, 15.2 nitrogen, 1 sulphur, and 0.6 phosphorus.

ichthyic (ik'thi-ik), a. [Gr. ichthys, of a fish, fishy, < ichthys, a fish.] Pertaining to fishes; having the characters of a fish; ichthyomorphic; ichthyopiscine; R. Owen.

ichthyoid. [L., etc., < Gr. ichthys, combining form of ichthys, a fish.] An element in compound words of Greek origin, meaning 'fish.'

Ichthyobus (ik'thi-ō-bus), n. See Ichtiobus.

Ichthycephali (ik'thi-ō-sef'a-li), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. ichthys, a fish, + kephalē, head.] A group of physostomous fishes, founded by Cope (1870) as an order, including eels of the family Monopteriidae.

ichthycephalous (ik'thi-ō-sef'a-lus), a. Of or pertaining to the Ichthycephali.

ichthyocol (ik'thi-ō-kol), n. Same as ichthyocolla.

ichthyocolla (ik'thi-ō-kol'ä), n. [L. (Pliny), < Gr. ichthys, a fish, + colla, glue, i. e. isinglass, also (in Pliny) the fish which produces it, < ichthys, fish, + colla, glue.] Fish-glue; isinglass. See isinglass.

ichthyocoprolite (ik'thi-ō-kop'rō-lit), n. [Gr. ichthys, a fish, + kôpros, dung, + lithos, stone: see coprolite.] The fossilized excrement of a fish.

ichthyocopus (ik'thi-ō-kop'rus), n. [NL., < Gr. ichthys, a fish, + kôpros, dung.] Same as ichthyocoprolite.

Ichthyocrinidæ (ik'thi-ō-krin'i-dē), n. pl. [NL. (Wachsmuth and Springer), < Ichthyocrinus + -idæ.] A family of articulate crinoids, typified by the genus Ichthyocrinus. They had small basal plates, the dorsal cup chiefly built up of radial plates of different orders, abutting laterally against one another or separated by interradials, and arms bifurcating and forming a wall continuous with the calyx. Most of them lived in the Devonian seas.

ichthyocrinoid (ik'thi-ōk'ri-noid), n. A crinoid of the family Ichthyocrinidæ.

Ichthyocrinus (ik'thi-ōk'ri-nus), n. [NL. (Conrad), < Gr. ichthys, fish, + crinon, lily (see crinoid).] An extinct genus of crinoids, typical of the family Ichthyocrinidæ.

ichthyodorulite (ik'thi-ō-dor'ō-lit), n. [Prop. ichthyodorulite, < Gr. ichthys, fish, + dorū, a spear, + lithos, a stone.] The fossilized spine of a fish or fish-like vertebrate. Ichthyodorulites are chiefly the spines which armed the front of the dorsal fins in selachians; but certain other extinct forms, named Acanthodidæ, had spines also on the anal, pectoral, and ventral fins. They are found in the greatest abundance in deposits of the Devonian epoch, and many of the fishes of that age are known only from such remains.

When, as in many cases, they (placoid forms of the exoskeleton) take the form of spines, these are called dermal defenses, and in a fossil state, ichthyodorulites.

Huxley, Anat. Vert., p. 111.

ichthyographic (ik'thi-ō-graf'ik), a. [Gr. ichthyography + -ic.] Pertaining to ichthyography.

ichthyography (ik'thi-ōg'ra-fi), n. [Gr. ichthys, a fish, + -ygraphia, < γράφειν, write.] The description of fishes; a treatise on fishes; descriptive ichthyology.

ichthyoid (ik'thi-oid), a. and n. [Gr. ichthys, fish-like, < ichthys, a fish, + eidos, form.] 1. a. Resembling a fish, or having the characters of a fish.

2. n. A member of the Ichthyopsida; any fish-like vertebrate. Huxley, 1863.

ichthyoidal (ik'thi-oi'dal), a. [ichthyoid + -al.] Same as ichthyoid.

ichthyol (ik'thi-ol), n. [Gr. ichthys, fish, + -ol.] A syrupy liquid with a bituminous odor and taste, prepared by the dry distillation of a bituminous mineral containing fossil fishes. It has been used externally in the treatment of various skin-diseases.

ichthyolatrous (ik'thi-ol'a-trus), a. [As ichthyolatry + -ous.] Of the nature of ichthyolatry; practising ichthyolatry; worshipping ichthyomorphic gods.

ichthyolatry (ik'thi-ol'a-tri), n. [Gr. ichthys, a fish, + λατρεία, worship.] Fish-worship; adoration of a fish-god. See *Dagon*2.

ichthyolic (ik'thi-ol'ik), a. [ichthyol + -ic.] Pertaining to or composed of ichthyol.

This is best met by using an ichthyolic ointment, or by painting on a zinc-ichthyol-gelatin preparation afterward. Medical News, XLIX, 433.

ichthyolite (ik'thi-ō-lit), n. [Gr. ichthys, a fish, + lithos, stone.] A fossilized fish, or the cast of a fossil fish.

ichthyologic (ik'thi-ō-loj'ik), a. [ichthyology + -ic.] Of or pertaining to ichthyology; related to ichthyology.

ichthyological (ik'thi-ō-loj'i-kal), a. [ichthyologic + -al.] Same as ichthyologic.

ichthyologically (ik'thi-ō-loj'i-kal-i), adv. As regards ichthyology.

ichthyologist (ik'thi-ō-lō-jist), n. [ichthyology + -ist.] One who is versed in ichthyology.

ichthyology (ik'thi-ol'ō-jī), n. [= F. ichthyologie = Pg. ichthyologia = It. ictiologia, < Gr. ichthys, a fish, + -λογία, < λέγειν, speak: see -ology. Cf. ichthyolegion, speak of fish.] The science of fishes; that department of zoölogy which treats of fishes, with reference to their structure, relations to one another and to other animals, classification, habits, and uses. Abbreviated ichth.

ichthyomancy (ik'thi-ō-man-si), n. [Gr. as if ichthiomanteia*, < ichthys, a fish, + μαντεία, a diviner.] Divination by means of the heads or the entrails of fishes.

ichthyomantic (ik'thi-ō-man'tik), a. [Gr. ichthys, a fish, + μαντεία, one who prophesies by means of fish: see ichthyomancy.] Relating to ichthyomancy.

Ichthyomorpha (ik'thi-ō-môr'fä), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. ichthys, a fish, + μορφή, form.] In Owen's system, an order of Amphibia, or a suborder of Batrachia, including the tailed batrachians. The term was contrasted with Ophiomorpha and Theriomorpha. It is equivalent to Urodela.

ichthyomorphic (ik'thi-ō-môr'fik), a. [Gr. ichthys, a fish, + μορφή, form.] 1. In zool., having the characters of a fish, or morphologically related to fishes; ichthyopsidan.—2. In myth., formed like a fish, altogether or in part; partaking of the form or character of a fish: as, the ichthyomorphic gods of ancient Assyria and Syria. See *Dagon*2.

ichthyopatolite (ik'thi-ō-pat'ō-lit), n. [Gr. ichthys, a fish, + πάτος, a foot-path (see path), + lithos, a stone.] The supposed fossil imprint of the pectoral fin-rays of a fish believed to have been able to move upon solid surfaces by means of these organs.

ichthyophagi, n. Plural of ichthyophagus.

ichthyophagist (ik'thi-ōf'a-jist), n. [ichthyophagy + -ist.] One who eats fish, or lives on a fish-diet.

ichthyophagus (ik'thi-ōf'a-gus), a. [NL. ichthyophagus, < Gr. ichthophagos (also ichthodagōs), eating fish, < ichthys, fish, + φαγειν, eat.] Eating or subsisting on fish; fish-eating; piscivorous.

A wretched ichthyophagus people must make shocking soldiers, weak as water. De Quincey, Autobiog. Sketches.

ichthyophagus (ik'thi-ōf'a-gus), n.; pl. ichthyophagi (-jī). [NL.: see ichthyophagus.] One who eats fish; one who subsists on fish.

They are still ichthyophagi, existing without any other subsistence but what the sea affords.

R. F. Burton, El-Medina, p. 144.

ichthyophagy (ik'thi-ōf'a-jī), n. [Gr. as if ichthophagia*, the eating of fish, < ichthophagos, eating fish: see ichthyophagous.] The practice of eating fish.

ichthyophthalmite (ik'thi-ōf-thal'mit), n. [Gr. ichthys, fish, + ὀφθαλμός, eye, + -ite2.] Fish-eye stone. See apophyllite.

ichthyophthira (ik'thi-ōf-thi'rä), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. ichthys, fish, + φθειρ, a louse: see phthiriasis.] An order of degraded crustaceans parasitic upon fishes; the fish-lice. They have a suctorial mouth, no respiratory organs, reduced or rudimentary limbs, and external ovisacs in the female. Excluding some forms which have been included in this order, but which are referable to rhizocephalous chirochids or elsewhere, the Ichthyophthira consist of the modern orders Siphonostoma and Lernæoda, the term being thus synonymous with Epizoa.

ichthyophthiran (ik'thi-ōf-thi'ran), a. and n. [Ichthyophthira + -an.] 1. a. Pertaining to or having the characters of the Ichthyophthira.

2. n. A fish-louse; one of the Ichthyophthira.

ichthyopodolite (ik'thi-ō-pod'ō-lit), n. [NL., < Gr. ichthys, a fish, + ποδός (podōs), = E. foot, + lithos, stone.] A name given to fossil tracks or traces of uncertain character supposed to have been made by members of a hypothetical genus Ichthyopodolites. Buckland, 1844.

ichthyopsid (ik'thi-ōp'sid), a. and n. 1. a. Pertaining to or having the characters of the Ichthyopsida. Also ichthyopsidan, ichthyopsidan.

The spinal accessory exists in no Ichthyopsid vertebrate. Huxley, Anat. Vert., p. 69.

2. n. A member of the Ichthyopsida. Also ichthyopsidan.

Ichthyopsida (ik'thi-ōp'si-dä), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. ichthys, fish, + ὄψις, appearance, view, + -ida.] One of three primary groups or provinces of vertebrates in Huxley's classification (the other two being Sauropsida and Mammalia), comprising the amphibians or batrachians and the fish and fish-like vertebrates; the branchiate or anamniotic Vertebrata. They have no amnion, and at most a rudimentary allantois, and breathe by gills during a part or the whole of life. They have urinary organs in the form of persistent Wolffian bodies; a tubular, bilocular, or at most a trilocular heart; never fewer than two aortic arches in the adult; nucleated blood-corpuscles; and no diaphragm, corpus callosum, or mammary glands. Also called Branchiata, Branchiotoce.

ichthyopsidan (ik'thi-ōp'si-dan), a. and n. Same as ichthyopsid.

There were two kinds of protovertebrates, namely piscine and reptilian, or ichthyopsidan and sauropsidan. Nature, XXXV, 391.

ichthyopsidan (ik'thi-ōp'sid'i-an), a. Same as ichthyopsid.

Ichthyopterygia (ik'thi-ōp-te-rij'i-ä), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. ichthys, a fish, + πτερυγία (pterygia), πτερόν (pteron), a wing or fin.] 1. An order of extinct reptiles; the ichthyosaurs. In Owen's classification of 1860 it is the third order of the class Reptilia, and in that of 1890 the fourth order of Hemiptera, or cold-blooded vertebrates, having a fish-like body, with a very short neck; limbs adapted for swimming, and with more than 5 many-jointed digits; numerous short, biconcave vertebrae, and no sacrum; the anterior ribs with bifurcate heads; episternum, clavicles, postorbital and suprasternal bones, and parietal foramen present; small maxillaries; long and large premaxillaries; the teeth confined to the maxillary, premaxillary, and premandibular bones, and implanted in a common alveolar groove; large orbits with a circle of sclerotic plates; and two small nostrils. See cuts under Ichthyosaurus and Ichthyosaurus.

2. [L. c.] Plural of ichthyopterygium.

ichthyopterygian (ik'thi-ōp-te-rij'i-an), a. and n. 1. a. Pertaining to or having the characters of the Ichthyopterygia; ichthyosaurian.

2. n. One of the Ichthyopterygia; an ichthyosaur.

ichthyopterygium (ik'thi-ōp-te-rij'i-um), n.; pl. ichthyopterygia (-ä). [NL., < Gr. ichthys, a fish, + πτερυγία (pterygia), πτερόν (pteron), a wing or fin.] The free appendage of the scapular or pelvic girdle modified as a fin: contrasted with chiropterygium.

Ichthyornidæ (ik'thi-ōr'ni-dē), n. pl. Same as Ichthyornithidæ.

Ichthyornis (ik'thi-ōr'nis), n. [NL., < Gr. ichthys, a fish, + ὄρνις, a bird.] A remarkable genus of birds, founded by Marsh

2. In the Greek or Orthodox Eastern Church, a representation of Christ, an angel, or a saint, in painting, relief, mosaic, etc. There are always two at least in a Greek church, one of Christ at the right of the holy doors, as one faces toward the bema, and one of the Theotocos on the left. In accordance with the decision of the seventh ecumenical council (the second of Nicea, A. D. 787), icons are honored with a relative worship or adoration (προσκύνησις), manifested by kissing, offerings of incense and lights, etc., but not with latría, or the supreme worship due to God alone. They are regarded as sacred and many are believed to be miraculous. A small icon, of the kind generally carried by the Russian clergy, is a triptych, diptych, or similar folding tablet, of wood or metal, decorated in enamel or niello with representations of sacred subjects. Also eikon ikon.

When robbing a church, a man will often offer several roubles' worth of candles to a neighboring icon, if it will only help him to pull out the jewels of the one he is attacking.

A. J. C. Hare, Russia, i.

The "miracle-working" ikon of Our Lady of Kazan, in the Kazan Cathedral at St. Petersburg, is adorned with jewels to the value of $60,000.

G. Kennan, The Century, XXXV, 882.

3. In logic, a sign or representation which stands for its object by virtue of a resemblance or analogy to it.

Icons are so completely substituted for their objects as to be hardly distinguished from them. Such are the diagrams of geometry. A diagram, indeed, so far as it has a general signification, is not a pure icon; but in the middle part of our reasonings we forget that abstractness in great measure, and the diagram is for us the very thing. So in contemplating a painting, there is a moment when we lose the consciousness that it is not the thing, the distinction of the real and the copy vanishes, and it is for the moment a pure dream—not any particular existence, and yet not general. At that moment, we are contemplating an icon.

C. S. Peirce, Amer. Jour. Math., VII, 181.

4. In scientific books, specifically, a plate, an engraving, or other printed representation.

iconantidypic (i-kon-an-ti-dip'tik), a. [< Gr. eikṓn, an image, + antí, opposite, + diátypēn, equiv. to diēu, dive, duck.] Presenting two images, one direct, the other reversed, of the same object: applied to a telescope otherwise called diploidian.

icones, n. Latin plural of icon.

iconic (i-kon'ik), a. [< L. iconicus, < Gr. eikonikós, representing a figure, copied, < eikṓn, a figure, likeness, see icon.] 1. Of or pertaining to a portrait or likeness or to portraiture; of the nature of a portrait.

The library also contains a magnificent series of portraits by Holbein, eighty-seven in number, highly finished in sepia and chalk, representing the chief personages of Henry VIII's court—all of them works of the highest beauty, and marvels of iconic vigour.

Encyc. Brit., XXIV, 601.

Perhaps, in dealing with the men that make portraits, we may be allowed to use a word that is scarcely English, and call them "iconic sculptors." . . . The French have helped themselves to this convenient adjective, and we may borrow it of them.

E. W. Gosse, The Century, XXXI, 39.

2. Of, pertaining to, or resembling in any way an icon or sacred image, or the style of such image-paintings.—3. In art, conventional: applied to such work as the statues of victorious athletes commonly dedicated to divinities in antiquity, or to memorial statues and portrait-busts executed after fixed models or types, as the busts of the sovereign set up in British courts of justice.

Judging from the character of the heads, it seems probable that most of the statues are iconic, and may be the portraits of Cyprian priests and kings, dedicated, like those from the Sacred Way at Branchide, to the deity of the temple.

C. T. Newton, Art and Archaeol., p. 307.

Iconic alabastrum. See alabastrum.

iconical (i-kon'ik-əl), a. [< iconic + -al.] Same as iconic.

As the work is entirely iconical, or consists only of figures without any letterpress, catchword, alphabet, or number to the pages, it was new, and uncommon to the book-binders.

B. Mendes da Costa, Elem. of Conchology, p. 36.

iconism (i'kon-izm), n. [< L. iconismus, < Gr. eikonismós, delineation; cf. eikónisma, a copy, image, < eikonízein, image: see iconize.] A figure or representation. [Rare.]

The fancy will employ itself . . . in making some kind of apish imitations, counterfeit iconisms, symbolical adumbrations and resemblances.

Cudworth.

iconize (i'kon-iz), v. t.; pret. and pp. iconized, ppr. iconizing. [< Gr. eikonízein, mold into form, give a semblance of, image, < eikṓn, an image: see icon.] To form into a likeness or resemblance. [Rare.]

This world is an image always iconized, or perpetually renewed.

iconoclasm (i-kon'ō-klazm), n. [= F. iconoclasme, < Gr. eikṓn, an image, + kláōs*, a breaking, < kláō, break.] 1. The act of breaking or destroying images; specifically, a general destruction of the images and pictures set up in churches as objects of veneration carried out by the Iconoclasts in the eighth and ninth centuries, and by Protestants in the Netherlands in the sixteenth century.

The general feeling of the community, fostered diligently by a numerous class of its most energetic and pious members, the monks, continued unchanged in its aversion to iconoclasm; and, although at the end of his reign Constantine succeeded in imposing upon every citizen of Constantinople an oath never again to worship an image, there can be little doubt that in a vast number of households secret leanings to image worship had been intensified rather than weakened by repressive measures.

Encyc. Brit., XII, 718.

Hence—2. The act of attacking cherished beliefs or traditional institutions regarded as based on error or superstition; the doctrine or spirit of one who so attacks.

Iconoclasm, whether manifested in religion or in politics, has regarded the existing order of things, not as a product of evolution, but as the work of artful priests and legislators of antiquity, which may accordingly be destroyed as summarily as it was created.

J. Fiske, Cosmic Philos., II, 476.

The time has been marked by a stress of scientific iconoclasm.

Stedman, Vict. Poets, p. 7.

iconoclast (i-kon'ō-klast), n. [= F. iconoclaste = Sp. Pg. It. iconoclasta, < MGr. NGr. eikonoklastēs, < Gr. eikṓn, an image, + kláōs*, a breaker (cf. kláōs, a vine-dresser), < kláō, break.] 1. A breaker or destroyer of images; a person conspicuously hostile to the use of images in Christian worship. Specifically—(a) [cap.] One of a sect or party in the Eastern Empire in the eighth and ninth centuries which opposed all use and honor or worship of icons or images, and destroyed them when in power. The party of Iconoclasts was originated by the emperor Leo the Isaurian, and afterward continued or revived by Constantine Copronymus and other emperors, especially Leo the Armenian and Theophilus. The emperors named treated those who honored icons with great cruelty, and after the death of the last of them the party of Iconoclasts soon became extinct. See iconoclastic.

Under his [Constantine Copronymus's] auspices a council of iconoclasts was held, in which the adoration and the use of images was condemned.

Jortin, Remarks on Eccles. Hist., an. 741.

(b) One of those Protestants of the Netherlands who, during the reign of Philip II., riotously destroyed the images in many of the Roman Catholic churches.

Hence—2. Any destroyer, denouncer, or expositor of errors or impostures; one who systematically attacks cherished beliefs.

iconoclastic (i-kon'ō-klas'tik), a. [= Pg. iconoclastico; as iconoclast + -ic.] Of or pertaining to iconoclasm, or to the opinions and practices of the Iconoclasts; given to breaking images, or to exposing errors of belief or false pretensions: as, iconoclastic enthusiasm.

Both were embellished with a profusion of statues; most of those at York were destroyed in the first emotions of iconoclastic zeal.

H. Swinburne, Travels through Spain, xlv.

Yet this question, thus prematurely agitated by the iconoclastic emperors, and at this period of Christianity so fatally mistimed, is one of the most grave, and it should seem inevitable controversies, arising out of our religion.

Milman, Latin Christianity, iv, 7.

iconograph (i-kon'ō-gráf), n. [< Gr. eikṓn, an image, + γράφειν, write: see iconography.] A figured illustration; the representation of anything by its image, as in drawing or engraving.

The illustrations have never been surpassed by the most expensive and careful iconographs.

Science, IV, 28.

iconographer (i-kō-nōg'ra-fēr), n. [< iconography + -er.] A person versed in iconography.

The lepidopter iconographer, when the ultimate butterfly has been described, will sign vainly for more fields to conquer.

Athenæum, Jan. 7, 1888, p. 19. iconographic (i-kon'ō-gráf'ik), a. [< iconography + -ic.] Relating to iconography; representing or describing by means of pictures or diagrams. A. Drummond.

iconographical (i-kon'ō-gráf'ik-əl), a. [< iconographic + -al.] Same as iconographic. [Rare.]

Namatia read aloud the history of her husband, but she does not seem to have prescribed its iconographical representation.

Athenæum, Oct. 13, 1883, p. 488.

iconography (i-kō-nōg'ra-fī), n. [= F. iconographie = Pg. iconografia = It. iconografia, < Gr. eikonographia, a sketch, description, < eikṓn, a portrait-painter, < eikṓn, an image, + γράφειν, write.] 1. That branch of knowledge which relates to the representation of persons or objects by means of images or statues, busts, paintings, drawings, engravings on gems or metals, and the like.—2. The art of producing likenesses, portraits, or graphic representations; the art of illustration.

As to the execution of the plates, no iconography of the present time excels them.

Science, VI, 308.

3. Pictorial representation in general; an illustrative figure or collection of figures.

The inspection alone of these curious iconographies of temples and palaces affects one as much by reading, almost, as by sight.

Burton, Anat. of Mel., p. 269.

iconolater (i-kō-nol'ā-tēr), n. [= F. iconolâtre, < Gr. eikṓn, an image, + λατρεῖν, a worshiper; cf. idolater.] An image-worshiper.

iconolatry (i-kō-nol'ā-trī), n. [= Pg. iconolatria, < Gr. eikṓn, an image, + λατρεία, worship; cf. idolatry.] The worship or adoration of images; idolatry.

iconologist (i-kō-nol'ō-jist), n. [< iconology + -ist.] One versed in iconology; one who makes a specialty of the study and identification of statues, painted or engraved likenesses, etc.

I. D'Israeli.

iconology (i-kō-nol'ō-jī), n. [= Sp. iconología = Pg. iconologia, < Gr. eikonología, figurative speaking, < eikṓn, a figure, image, + -λογία, < λέγειν, speak: see -ology.] 1. The science or art of representation by effigies or pictures.—2. A description of statues, pictures, engravings, etc.

iconomachal, a. [Erroneously iconomical (see the extract); with term. -al, = Sp. iconómico = Pg. It. iconomaco, < Gr. eikonomachos, warring against images, < eikṓn, an image, + μάχεσθαι, fight.] Eccles., opposed or hostile to pictures or images.

We should be too iconomachal to question the pictures of the winds, as commonly drawn in humane heads and with their cheeks distended.

Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., v. 22.

iconomachist (i-kō-nom'ā-kist), n. [< iconomach-y + -ist.] One who is opposed to and contends against the use and cultus of icons; an iconoclast.

The noted iconomachist Antony of Sylaum was raised in 821 to the patriarchate of Constantinople.

Robertson, History of the Christian Church, III, 300.

iconomachy (i-kō-nom'ā-ki), n. [< Gr. eikonomachia, a war against images, < eikonomachos, warring against images: see iconomachal.] Enmity or opposition to icons or sacred images; the principles and conduct of the Iconoclasts.

The monastic party (at the Nicene Council of A. D. 787) declared that iconomachy was worse than the worst of heresies, because it denied the Saviour's incarnation.

Robertson, History of the Christian Church, III, 135.

iconomatic (i-kon'ō-mat'ik), a. [Appar. abbr. for iconomatic*, < Gr. eikṓn, an image, + ονοματ(α), name.] Expressing ideas or representing words by means of pictured objects: as, iconomatic writing. Brinton.

iconomaticism (i-kon'ō-mat'isizm), n. [< iconomatic + -ism.] A system of picture-writing, or the representation of words by pictured objects.

How complete a system of iconomaticism they [Egyptian and Chinese characters] passed through is unknown.

Sci. Amer., N. S., LVI, 56.

iconomical, a. See iconomachal.

iconophilism (i-kō-nof'ī-lizm), n. [< Gr. eikṓn, an image, + φίλος, loving, + -ism.] A liking or taste for pictures or engravings. [Rare.]

He [a print-dealer] tells you that he instructs his customers in bibliomania, in biblioepky, in grangerism, in iconophilism, in the knowledge of art.

New York Times, Feb. 12, 1888.

iconophilist (i-kō-nof'ī-list), n. [< Gr. eikṓn, an image, + φίλος, loving, + E. -ist.] A connoisseur of pictures, engravings, or prints; a collector or judge of prints. [Rare.]

The moral of that is, that in collecting prints all is not rose-colored, and one must not think of becoming an iconophilist without the study and application required for any grave pursuit.

New York Times, Feb. 12, 1888.

iconostas (i-kon'ō-stas), n. Same as iconostasis.

iconostasia, n. Plural of iconostasion.

iconostasion, iconostasion (i-kon'ō-stā'si-on, -um), n.; pl. iconostasia (-ā). [NL., < NGr. eikonostasion, < εἰκονοστάσις: see iconostasis.] In the Gr. Ch., a movable desk or stand on which icons are placed, especially the icon of the festival or the saint of the day.

iconostasis (i-kō-nos'tā-sis), n. [< NGr. eikonostasis, < Gr. eikṓn, an image, + στάσις, a standing, position, < ιστάσθαι, stand.] In Greek churches, a high solid screen, usually of wood, reaching at least half-way and often nearly or quite to the ceiling of the church, and separating the bema, chapel of prothesis, and diaconicon from the rest of the church. It has three doors, the holy doors in the center, leading directly into the bema proper or sanctuary (ιερατεῖον), a door on the right of this, as one faces the bema, admitting to the diaconicon or sacristy, and one on the left opening into the chapel of prothesis. It is from this last door that the processions known as the Little and the Great Entrance (see entrance) emerge. The doors, especially the central or holy doors, are provided with a veil (amphithyra). As the choir of an Oriental church does not intervene between the sanctuary and the nave, the iconostasis answers in some respects both to the Western altar-rails and to a rood-screen. Ritually it corresponds to altar-rails, as it divides the sanctuary from all the rest of the church, the choir included.

icosacolic (i'kō-sa-kō'lik), a. [< Gr. εἰκοσάκολος, of twenty clauses, < εἰκοσι, twenty, + κόλος, member, clause: see colon.] In anc. pros., consisting of twenty cola (members or series): as, an icosacolic canticum. Also spelled eicosacolic.

icosaedral (i'kō-sa-hē'dral), a. [Also icosihedral; < icosaedr-on + -al.] Having twenty faces.—ICOSAEDRAL function. See polyhedral function, under polyhedral.—ICOSAEDRAL group. See group.—IC- icosahedral number, one of the numbers 1, 12, 48, 142, 255, 466, etc., whose form is $\frac{1}{2}n(n^2 - 5n + 2)$.

Regular Icosahedron.

those adjacent to it. It has 12 vertices and 30 edges, 3 edges per face, 5 edges per vertex. — Great Icosahedron, a regular solid of which each face subtends at the center the space subtended by 4 faces and 6 half-faces of the ordinary icosahedron. It has 20 faces, 12 vertices, 30 edges, 3 edges per face, 5 edges per vertex. Each vertex is enveloped twice by the series of faces about it, and the center is enclosed seven times.

Great Icosahedron.

Truncated icosahedron, a dodecahedron formed by cutting down the corners of the icosahedron parallel to the faces of the coaxial regular dodecahedron until the original faces are regular hexagons, so that the solid has 20 hexagonal and 12 pentagonal faces.

icosander (i-kō-san' dēr), n. [< NL. icosandrus: see icosandrus.] In bot., a plant having twenty or more stamens inserted on the calyx.

icosandria (i-kō-san' dri-ā), n. pl. [< NL. icosandrus, with twenty stamens: see icosandrus.] In bot., the twelfth class in the Linnean system of classification, distinguished by having twenty or more stamens inserted on the calyx, as in the rose family. The plants in this class produce the most esteemed fruits.

icosandrian (i-kō-san' dri-an), a. [< Icosandria + -ian.] Same as icosandrous.

icosandrous (i-kō-san' drus), a. [< NL. icosandrus, with twenty stamens, < Gr. icosai, twenty, + andros (andros), a male (in mod. bot. a stamen): see -androus.] Of or pertaining to the icosandria.

icosasemic (i-kō-sa-sē'mik), a. [< Gr. icosai, twenty, + sema, a mark, semeion, a mark, mora.] In anc. pros., containing or amounting to twenty semeia or units of time; having or constituting a magnitude of twenty mora or normal shorts: thus, a dactylic or anapestic pentapody is icosasemic. Also spelled icosasemic.

icosian (i-kō-si-an), a. [< Gr. icosai, dial. ekati, hekati, hekati, twenty, = L. viginti = E. twenty: see twenty.] Pertaining to twenty. — Icosian game, a game in which there are twenty stations each united with three others by paths, as the 20 vertices of an ordinary dodecahedron are connected by the 30 edges. Five stations being named as consecutive, a player endeavors to pass through all the other stations without passing through any one twice.

icosidodecahedron (i-kō-si-dō'dek-a-hē'drōn), n. [< NL. icosai, twenty, + dōdeka, twelve, + edra, seat, base.] In geom., a solid of thirty-two faces formed by cutting down the corners of the icosahedron parallel to the faces of the coaxial regular dodecahedron until the new faces just touch at the angles, thus leaving 20 triangular and 12 pentagonal faces. It is one of the thirteen Archimedean solids. — Truncated icosidodecahedron, a solid having 12 decagonal faces belonging to the regular dodecahedron, 20 hexagonal faces belonging to the icosahedron, and 30 square faces belonging to the semi-regular triacontahedron. It is one of the thirteen Archimedean solids.

icosihedral, icosihedron. See icosahedral, icosahedron.

icositrahedron (i-kō-si-tet-ra-hē'drōn), n. [< NL. icosai, = E. twenty, + etra, tetrapes, = E. four, + edra, seat, base.] In crystal., a solid, belonging to the isometric system, which is contained by twenty-four similar four-sided planes; a tetragonal trisoctahedron, or trapezohedron.

icosteid (i-kōs'tē-id), n. A fish of the family Icosteidae.

Icosteidae (i-kōs'tē-i-dē), n. pl. [< NL. icosai, = E. twenty, + etra, tetrapes, = E. four, + edra, seat, base.] A family of acanthopterygian fishes, typified by the genus Icosteus, to which different limits have been assigned. (a) In a restricted sense, fishes with a loose flaccid skin, unarmed head, long dorsal and anal fins with scarcely differentiated spines, and thoracic ventral fins: supposed to be related to the Stromateidae. It was constituted for two deep-sea fishes obtained off the Californian coast. (b) The family as above defined, together with the Bathymasteridae. It is scarcely distinguishable from Stromateidae.

icosteine (i-kōs'tē-in), n. A fish of the family Icosteidae.

Icosteus (i-kōs'tē-us), n. [< NL. irreg. < Gr. icosai, yield, give way, + ostion, a bone.] The typical genus of the family Icosteidae, having a Icosteus enigmaticus.

naked body with some spinules along the lateral line, and quadridate ventrals. I. enigmaticus is a deep-sea fish of California.

icret, n. A word of dubious meaning and origin. See the second extract.

As we find in the Survey book of England, the king demanded in manner no other tribute than certain Icres of Iron, and Iron barres. Holland, tr. of Camden, p. 361.

An icre is ten Bars. Gibson, tr. of Camden (margin).

-ics. [< -ic + pl. -s, after L. and Gr. plurals in -ic-a, -ic-ū, neut. pl. of adjectives in -ic-us, -ic-ōs, in names of sciences or arts, as in μαθηματικά, mathematical (matters), interchanging with forms in the fem. sing. L. -ic-a, or -ic-e, Gr. -ic-ē (ἐπιστήμη, knowledge, science, or τέχνη, art, being understood), as μαθηματική, L. mathematica, mathematice, mathematical (science). In F., G., etc., these words follow the fem. sing. form; in E. either or both forms are used: see examples.] A termination of Greek origin, denoting a science or an art. Words with this termination are properly plural, but are now commonly regarded as singular, being often accompanied by forms actually in the singular, as mathematics, hydrostatics, esthetics or esthetic, metrics or metric, etc. In some cases the singular alone is in use, as in logic, music, the adjective being then exclusively in -ic-al, as logical, musical, while in a few a distinction of meaning has grown up, as between physic and physics. Any adjective in -ic, applicable to a branch of knowledge, may have an accompanying noun in -ics.

Icteria (ik-tē'ri-ā), n. [< Gr. ictēros, a certain bird: see Icterus.] A notable genus of American oscine passerine birds; the yellow-breasted chats or chattering flycatchers. It was founded by Vieillot in 1807, and has been variously referred to the Troglodytidae or thrushes, Vireonidae or greenlets, or made the type of the Icteriinae as a subfamily of Sylviidae or Dendroicae. It is characterized by a stout compressed bill with high arched culmen, greenish coloration above, with bright yellow breast and white abdomen, and a size unusual in the last-named family. The type is I. virens or I. viridis, which abounds in the United States, is migratory and insectivorous, a volatile and versatile songster with remarkable powers of mimicry, and which nests in shrubbery, laying usually four white eggs with reddish speckles. I. longicauda is another species or variety, inhabiting the southwestern portions of the United States. See cut under chat.

icteric (ik-tēr'ik), a. and n. [= F. icterique = Sp. icterico = Pg. icterico = It. icterico, < L. ictericus, < Gr. ἰκτερός, jaundiced, < ictēros, jaundice: see icterus.] I. a. 1. Affected with jaundice. — 2. Preventing or dispelling jaundice. — Icteric fever, icteric remittent fever, remittent icteric fever. See Fever.

II. n. A remedy for jaundice. icterical (ik-tēr'ik-al), a. [< icteric + -al.] Same as icteric.

Our understandings, if a crime be lodged in the will, being like icterical eyes, transmitting the species to the soul with prejudice, disaffection, and colours of their own framing. Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), I. 167.

icterid (ik-tē'rid), n. One of the Icteriidae.

Icteriidae (ik-tēr'i-dē), n. pl. [< NL. ictēros + -idae.] A large family of American oscine passerine birds with 9 primaries, a conic-acute bill with unnotched tip, rictus without bristles, and angulated commissure. The family is very closely related to the Fringillidae; it has also affinities with the Corvidae, and represents in America the Sturnidae or starlings of the old world. There are upward of 100 species, assigned to many genera, containing the birds variously known as American starlings, blackbirds, orioles or hangnests, meadow-larks, cow-birds, bobolinks, etc. The family is divided by Coues into four subfamilies, Agelaiinae or marsh-blackbirds, Sturnellinae or meadow-larks, Icteriinae or orioles and hangnests, and Quiscalinae or crow-blackbirds. A subfamily Icteriinae includes all the American orioles or hangnests and related forms.

icterine (ik-tē'rin), a. [< NL. icterinus, < Gr. ictēros, jaundice: see icterus.] Yellow, or marked with yellow, as a bird; specifically, having the characters of the Icteriidae or Icteriinae.

icteritious (ik-tēr'ish-us), a. [< L. icterus, Gr. ictēros, the jaundice, + E. -itious.] Yellow; having the color of jaundiced skin.

icteritious (ik-tēr'i-tus), a. Same as icteritious. icteroid (ik-tē'roid), a. [< Gr. ἰκτεροειδής, contr. ικτερώδης, jaundiced, < ictēros, jaundice, + eidos, form.] Yellow, as if jaundiced.

icterus (ik'te-rus), n. [< L. icterus, Gr. ἰκτερός, jaundice; also a bird of a yellowish-green color, by looking at which, according to the simple therapeutics of the ancients, a jaundiced person was cured—the bird died; cf. ικτερίς (sc. ἰκτερίς), L. icterias, a yellowish kind of stone.] 1. The jaundice. — 2. In bot., a yellow appearance assumed by wheat and some other plants under the influence of prolonged exposure to moisture and cold. — 3. [cap.] In ornith., a Brissonian (1760) genus of birds, approximately equivalent to the modern family Icteriidae; subsequently used with various limitations, or as conterminous with the subfamily Icteriinae; now restricted to the American orioles or hangnests, such as the Baltimore oriole, Icterus galbula. The type is technically considered to be the troopial, Oriolus icterus (Linnaeus), now called Icterus vulgaris. See cut under troopial. — 4. [cap.] A genus of mammals. Griffith, 1827.

ictic (ik'tik), a. [< L. as if *icticus, < ictus, a blow: see ictus.] Sudden or abrupt, as if produced by a blow; marked. Bushnell. [Rare.]

Icticyon (ik-tis'i-on), n. [< NL. ictēros, the yellow-breasted marten (taken in general sense of a 'weasel'), + κυν, a dog, = E. hound.] A genus of Canidae with small molars, 1 above and 2 below on each side, containing I. venaticus, the bush-dog of South America, a small, close-haired species with short limbs and tail. The genus is a peculiar one; it is sometimes referred wrongly to the family Mustelidae, but belongs to the true dogs, Caninae, and is related to the African Lycyon and the Indian Cyon. Lund, 1842. Also written Ictidocyon.

ictide (ik'tid), n. An animal of the genus Ictides (or Arctictis); a binturong: as, the black ictide, Ictides ather.

Ictides (ik-tid'ez), n. [< NL. irreg. < Gr. ictēros, the yellow-breasted marten, + eidos, form.] A genus of Viverridae, of the subfamily Arctictinae, containing the binturongs: a synonym of Arctictis.

Ictinia (ik-tin'i-ā), n. [< Gr. ἰκτινός, a kite.] A notable genus of kites, of the subfamily Milvinae and family Falconidae, founded by Vieillot in 1816. The tail is short and even; the wings are moderate, with the third and second primaries longest, and the first very short; the feet are small; the tarsi are scutellate in front; the bill is small but robust, with very convex culmen and small subcircular nostrils; and the plumage is dark-plumbeous or bluish. There are two species, both American, one of which is the common Mississippi kite, I. subcaerulea or mississippiensis, and the other the South American, I. plumbea.

Ictiobinae (ik'ti-ō-bi-nē), n. pl. [< Ictiobus + -inae.] A subfamily of Catostomidae, with an elongate dorsal fin, compressed oblong body, and an interapertural fontanelle. It embraces a few large fishes, inhabiting chiefly the Mississippi and Great Lake basins, known as buffalo-fishes or buffaloes, and carp-suckers. See cut under carp-sucker.

Ictiobus (ik-ti-ō-bus), n. [< NL. ictēros, a perversion of Ichthyobus, < Gr. ἰχθύς, a fish, + βοῦς, an ox (taken for 'buffalo': see buffalo).] A genus of fishes of the family Catostomidae, popularly known as buffalo-fishes, typical of the subfamily Ictiobinae. Rafinesque, 1820. See cut under carp-sucker.

Ictitherium (ik-ti-thē'ri-um), n. [< Gr. ictēros, the yellow-breasted marten, + θηρίον, a wild beast.] A genus of fossil carnivorous mammals from the Miocene of Greece, of uncertain systematic position: supposed to belong to the Viverridae, whence the name, given by Gaudry; by others regarded as related to the Hyaenidae.

ictus (ik'tus), n.; pl. ictus. [< L. ictus, a blow, stroke, stab, thrust; in prosody or music, a beating time, a beat; < icere, pp. ictus, strike, hit, smite.] 1. A stroke: as, ictus solis, sunstroke. — 2. In pros. and music, rhythmic or metrical stress; additional intensity of utterance or delivery distinguishing one time or syllable in a foot or series from the others. Metrical ictus in poetry is analogous to syllabic stress or accent in ordinary speech. In modern or accentual poetry an ictus regularly coincides with the syllabic stress or accent, primary or secondary. In classical or quantitative poetry the ictus was also a stress-accent, but was independent of the syllabic accent, which was a difference in tone or pitch. It regularly attached itself to a long time or syllable as contrasted with one or more shorts, but a long or longs could be metrically unaccented. The conflict between ictus and accent in ancient poetry may be exemplified by the line

Connūbio jūgam stābili prōpriumque dīcabo (Virgil, Aeneid, I. 78),

in which the accent is marked and the syllables bearing the ictus are italicized. The part of a foot on which the ictus falls is called the thesis (but see arsis). In a dipody one ictus is stronger than the other. In a colon the ictus of one measure dominates all others. A subordinate ictus can also measure the principal ictus within the same foot.

icy (i'si), a. [ME. icy, < AS. isig (= D. isig, G. isig = Sw. isig); < is, ice, + -ig, E. -y.] 1. Pertaining to, composed of, produced by, resembling, or abounding with ice: as, an icy surface; icy coldness; the icy regions of the north.

There is no armour against fate;

Death lays his icy hands on kings.

Shirley, Contention of Ajax and Ulysses, iii.

Tempt icy seas, where scarce the waters roll,

Where clearer flames glow round the frozen pole.

Pope, Windsor Forest, l. 389.

Solar beams powerful enough to fuse the snows and blister the human skin . . . may pass through the air, and still leave it at an icy temperature.

Tyndall, Forms of Water, p. 102.

2. Figuratively, characterized by coldness or coolness, as of manner, influence, etc.; frigid; chilling; freezing; indifferent.

If he be leaden, icy, cold, unwilling,
Be thou so too.

Shak., Rich. III., iii. 1.

Icy was the department with which Philip received these demonstrations of affection.

Motley, Dutch Republic, I. 136.

icy-pearled (i'si-pèrld), a. Studded with span-gles of ice. [Rare.]

So mounting up in icy-pearled car,

Through middle empire of the freezing air.

He wander'd long, till thee he spied from far.

Milton, Ode, D. F. I., iii.

id. An abbreviation of idem.

-id¹. [Formerly also -ide (< F.); = F. -ide = Sp. Id. -ido, < L. -idus, a term, forming adjectives from verbs in -ere, -ere, or from nouns, as in acidus, acid, < acere, be sour, aridus, arid, < arere, be dry, fluidus, fluid, < fluere, flow, vividus, living, < vivere, live, morbidus, morbid, < morbus, disease, turbidus, turbid, < turba, disturbance, etc. The suffix is really -dus (-do-), the -i repr. the orig. or supplied stem-vowel; it occurs without the vowel in absurdus, absurd, blandus, bland, crudus, raw (crude), etc. Cf. Gr. -id-ns, -id-ns, etc.: see -id².] 1. A common termination in adjectives (and nouns derived from adjectives) of Latin origin, as in acid, arid, fluid, vivid, turbid, morbid, flaccid, frigid, torrid, solid, etc. It is not used as a formative in English.—2. [NL. -idum, neut. of L. -idus.] In chem., a formative (also spelled -ide, and when so spelled generally pronounced -id) suffixed to names of elements to form names of compounds, as in oxid, chlorid, bromide, iodide, sulphid, etc., designating compounds of oxygen, chlorine, bromine, iodine, sulphur, etc. Usage is, in general, in favor of the form -ide; but in new formations, and in many of the old ones, the form -id is also in use.

-id². [(1) L. NL. -is (-id-), pl. -id-es, fem.; (2) L. NL. -id-es, pl. -id-æ; both of Greek origin: see -ides, -ideæ, and -is²; cf. -ad².] 1. The termination of nouns Englished from Latin or New Latin feminine nouns (ultimately Greek or on the Greek model) in -is, as caryatid, hydatid, etc.—2. In zool., the termination of nouns Englished from Latin or New Latin nouns in -idæ, as felid, from Felidæ, fringillid, from Fringillidæ, etc. In this dictionary such English forms, being always adjacent to their obvious primitives, are usually left without etymological note.

-ida. [NL., assumed as a neut. pl. to -ides, pl. -idæ.] In zool., a frequent termination of the names of groups of animals, of no determinate rank in the classificatory scale. Entomologists often use it for subfamilies, in which case it is the same as -ina. It may or may not be etymologically the same as -ida.

-idæ. [L. NL., pl. of -ides, < Gr. -id-ns, pl. -idai, patronymic suffix: see -ides.] 1. In words of Greek origin, a suffix denoting the descendants of a person to whose name the suffix is attached, or a family or kindred of a particular origin: as, the Heracida, Homerida, Eupatri-da, etc. Specifically.—2. In zool., the regular termination of the names of families, suffixed to the stem of the name of the genus whence that of the family is derived, as Felidæ (from Felis), Laniidæ (from Lanius), Apodidæ (from Apus), etc. When the stem ends in -i, the termination is properly, according to Greek analogies, -adæ, as Lamiadæ, Sinuidæ, etc.; but, for mechanical uniformity, zoologists prefer to use -idæ in all cases. See -id².

Idæan (i-dē'an), a. [L. Idæus, < Gr. Idaios, < Idō, L. Ida (see def.)] Pertaining to Mount Ida, (a) a mountain near the ancient Troy, or (b) the chief mountain in Crete, the mystic birthplace of Zeus: as, the Idæan Zeus.

Here eke that famous golden Apple grew . . .

For which th' Idæan Ladies disagreed.

Spenser, F. Q., II. vii. 54.

Idalian (i-dā'lian), a. [L. Idalius, adj., < Idalius, also Idalia, Gr. Idāllon, a city in Cyprus.] Of or pertaining to the ancient town of Idalia or Idaliium in Cyprus, or to Aphrodite (Venus), to whom it was consecrated; inhabiting Idalia.

Idalian Aphrodite beautiful,

Fresh as the foam, new-bathed in Paphian wells.

Tennyson, Enone.

ide¹ (id), n. [Norw. id, also called idmurt (murt, mort, small-fry, also a roach), = Sw. id, ide; in NL. idus.] A cyprinoid fish, Leuciscus idus or Idus melanotus. The golden ide is a cultivated variety, known as the orfe. It resembles the chub, and is found in northern European waters.

ide², n. [ME.: see ides.] See ides.

The first [season in the year] . . . is Vere, and y^t begyn-neth the vij. ide of Feuerell and endurith to the vij. ide of May.

Arnold's Chron., p. 176.

-ide¹. [See -id¹.] 1. An obsolete form of -id¹ in adjectives like acide, fluide, etc. See -id¹, 1.—2. In chem., same as -id², 2.

-ide². [See -id².] 1. Same as -id², 1.—2. In zool., same as -id², 2.

idea (i-dē'a), n. [Also dial. idee; = F. idée = Sp. Id. idea = Pg. idea, idea = D. G. Dan. idea = Sw. idé, < L. idea (idéa, in ML. appar. idéa) (first in Seneca; Cicero writes it as Greek), a (Platonic) idea, archetype, < Gr. idéa, form, the look or semblance of a thing as opposed to reality, a kind, sort; in the Platonic philosophy the idéai were general or ideal forms, pattern forms, archetype models, L. formæ, of which, respectively, all created things were the im-perfect antitypes or representations; < idēiv, see, = L. videre, see, = Skt. √ vid, know, per-ceive, = AS. witian, E. wit, know: see wit.] 1. In the Platonic philosophy, and in similar idealistic thought, an archetype, or pure im-material pattern, of which the individual ob-jects in any one natural class are but the im-perfect copies, and by participation in which they have their being: in this sense the word is generally qualified by the adjective Platonic.

The more probable view, Parmenides, of these ideas is that they are patterns fixed in nature, and that other things are like them; and that what is meant by the participation of other things in the ideas is really assimilation to them.

Plato, Parmenides (tr. by Jowett), III. 249.

Socrates, he [Parmenides] said, I admire the bent of your mind towards philosophy; tell me, now, was this your own distinction between abstract ideas and the things which partake of them? and do you think that there is an idea of likeness apart from the likeness which we possess, or of the one and many, or of the other notions of which Zeno has been speaking?

I think that there are such abstract ideas, said Socra-tes.

Parmenides proceeded. And would you also make ab-stract ideas of the just and the beautiful and the good, and of all that class of notions?

Yes, he said, I should.

And would you make an abstract idea of man distinct from us and from all other human creatures, or of fire and water?

I am often undecided, Parmenides, as to whether I ought to include them or not.

Plato, Parmenides (tr. by Jowett), III. 246.

2. A mental image or picture. [Although Sir W. Hamilton says that idea never was used in any language in any but the Platonic sense (def. 1) until the time of Descartes, in English, as in French, this second meaning has been since the middle of the sixteenth century the commoner one in literature.]

Within my hart, though hardly it can shew

Thing so divine to view of earthly eye,

The fayre Idea of your celestiall hew

And every parte remains immortally.

Spenser, Sonnets, xlv.

When he shall hear she died upon his words,

The idea of her life shall sweetly creep

Into his study of imagination.

Shak., Much Ado, iv. 1.

[Species] is called idea [of the Greeks], which is as much to say as a common shape conceived in the mind, through some knowledge had before of one or two individuals having that shape: so as after we have seen one wolfe, or two, we beare the shape thereof continually in our minds, and thereby are able to know a wolfe whenever we find him.

Brundeville, Art of Logicke (1599), iv.

Yet still how faint by precept is express

The living Image in the painter's breast;

Thence endless streams of fair ideas flow

Strike in the sketch or in the picture glow.

Pope, To Mr. Jervas.

3. In the language of Descartes and of English philosophers, an immediate object of thought—that is, what one feels when one feels, or fancies when one fancies, or thinks when one thinks, and, in short, whatever is in one's understand-ing and directly present to cognitive conscious-ness. With the nominalists Berkeley and Hume the meaning of the word hardly departs from def. 2 above. With Reid, Buzald, Stewart, and others it denotes an ob-ject different from the real thing and from the mind, but mediating between them. But Hume uses the word idea in a somewhat peculiar sense, to mean a sensation repro-duced and worked over.

Whatever the mind perceives in itself, or is the im-mediate object of perception, thought, or understanding, that I call idea. Locke, Human Understanding, II. viii. § 9.

Since therefore the objects of sense exist only in the mind, and are withal thoughtless and inactive, I choose to mark them by the word idea, which implies those prop-erties.

Bp. Berkeley, Human Knowledge, I. 29.

All the perceptions of the human mind resolve them-selves into two distinct kinds, which I call Impressions and Ideas. The difference betwixt these consists in the degrees of force and liveliness with which they strike upon the mind and make their way into our thoughts or con-sciousness. These perceptions which enter with the most force and violence we name impressions; and under this name I comprehend all our sensations, passions, and emo-tions, as they make their first appearance in the soul. By ideas, I mean the faint images of these in thinking and reasoning. Hume, Treatise of Human Nature, I. i. § 1.

The term idea is commonly used to include both images and concepts, marking off the whole region of the repre-sentative from the presentative. But like the term no-tion, it tends now to be confined to concepts.

J. Sully, Outlines of Psychol., vii.

4. A conception of what is desirable or ought to be, different from what has been observed; a governing conception or principle; a teleolo-gical conception.

For anie understanding knoweth the skill of the artificer standeth in that idea or foreconceit of the work, and not in the work itself.

Sir P. Sidney, Def. of Poesie.

I thought you once as fair

As women in th' idea are.

Cowley, The Mistress.

There is what I call the American idea. . . This idea demands, as the proximate organization thereof, a democ-racy—that is, a government of all the people, by all the people, for all the people; of course, a government on the principles of eternal justice, the unchanging law of God; for shortness' sake, I will call it the idea of Freedom.

Theodore Parker, Speech at Antislavery Convention, [Boston, May 29, 1850.]

5. In the Kantian philos., a conception of rea-son the object of which transcends all possible experience, as God, Freedom of the Will, Im-mortality; in the Hegelian philos., the absolute truth of which everything that exists is the ex-pression—the ideal realized, the essence which includes its own existence: in the latter sense commonly used with the definite article; in other a priori philosophies, an a priori concep-tion of a perfection to be aimed at, not corre-sponding to anything observed, nor ever fully realized.

Idea is the thorough adequacy of thought to itself, the solution of the contradictions which attach to thought, and hence, in the last resort, the coincidence or equilib-rium of subjective notion and objectivity, which are the finite expression of that fundamental antithesis of thought.

Wallace, Logic of Hegel, Prolegomena, xxiii.

6. An opinion; a thought, especially one not well established by evidence.

That fellow seems to me to possess but one idea, and that a wrong one.

Johnson, in Boswell, an. 1770.

Unluckily Lord Palmerston became possessed with the idea that the French minister in Greece was secretly set-ting the Greek Government on to resist our claims.

J. McCarthy, Hist. Own Times, xix.

7. An abstract principle, of not much immedi-ate practical consequence in existing circum-stances.

France went to war for the idea when she had nothing else to go to war for; and, having bound liberty hand and foot at home, proclaimed herself again the apostle of lib-erty.

Stubbs, Medieval and Modern Hist., p. 238.

8. [cap.] In entom., a genus of nymphalid but-terflies, based on the Indian Nymphalis idea: now called Hestia. Fabricius, 1808.—9. In musi-c, a theme or subject; a phrase; sometimes, a figure. Often called a musical idea.—Absolute idea, the idea considered as the source of all reality.—Architectonic idea, the preliminary plan or sketch of a science.—Association of ideas. See association.—De-complex, duplex idea, a union of two or more complex ideas in one.—Determinate idea. See determinate.—Innate idea. See innate.—Material idea, or idea in the brain, an impression made upon the brain by an external object.—Platonic idea. See def. 1.

ideaed, idea'd (i-dē'ad), a. [idea + -ed².] Provided with or possessed of an idea or ideas: used chiefly in compounds: as, a one-ideaed man.

The writer had omitted to put the idea'd words into red ink; so they had to be picked out with infinite difficulty from the mass of un-idea'd ones.

C. Reade, Love me Little, vi.

ideagenous (i-dē-aj'e-nus), a. [idea + -ge-nous.] Generating or giving rise to ideas.

Each sensory impression leaves behind a record in the structure of the brain—an ideagenous molecule, so to speak; . . . It is these ideagenous molecules which are the physical basis of memory. Huxley, Animal Automatism.

ideal (i-dē'al), a. and n. [F. ideal, now ideal = Sp. Id. ideal = It. ideale = D. ideaal = G. Dan. Sw. ideal, < LL. ideālis, existing in idea, < L. idea, idea: see idea.] I. a. 1. Of or pertaining to or consisting in ideas.

The plays of children are endless imitation, and the constant exercise of the ideal faculty.

J. F. Clarke, Self-Culture, p. 176.

Even now few Americans set a proper value on the relative bearing of our ideal and intellectual progress thus far.

Steinman, Poets of America, Int., p. ix.

It will be understood that by an ideal object is meant an object present in idea but not yet given in reality.

T. H. Green, Prolegomena to Ethics, § 229, note.

2. Existing only in idea; confined to thought or imagination. Hence—(a) Not real or practical; imaginary; visionary; incapable of being realized or carried out in fact: as, ideal wealth or happiness; an ideal scheme of benevolence.

He [Spenser] lifts everything, not beyond recognition, but to an ideal distance where no mortal, I had almost said human, fleck is visible.

Lowell, Among my Books, 2d ser., p. 186.

(b) Conforming completely to a standard of perfection; perfect.

There will always be a wide interval between practical and ideal excellence.

Rambler.

Planning ideal commonwealths.

Southey.

All virtue, all duty, all activeness of the human character, are set out by him [Spenser], under the forms of chivalry, for our instruction: but his ideal knight is Christian to the core.

Gladstone, Might of Right, p. 211.

3. In philos., regarding ideas as the only real entities; pertaining to or of the nature of idealism.

The advantage of the ideal theory over the popular faith is this, that it presents the world in precisely that view which is most desirable to the mind.

Emerson, Nature.

4. Arising from ideas or conceptions; based upon an ideal or ideals; manifesting or embodying imagination; imaginative: as, the ideal school in art or literature; an ideal statue or portrait.—Ideal beauty. See beauty.—Ideal bitangent, a real line which touches a curve at two imaginary points.—Ideal chord, in geom., that part of a line not really cutting a circle which lies between two points, H and H', conjugate with respect to the circle and bisected by the diameter through the pole of the line.—Ideal diameter. See diameter.—Ideal number, in the theory of complex numbers, a number not in the scheme of complex numbers considered in any investigation, but specially introduced as a factor of a number which is prime so far as the system of complex numbers considered is concerned.—Ideal partition, in logic, a division of a whole into parts which can be sundered only in abstraction, not in reality; metaphysical partition. See W. Hamilton.—Syn. 2. Imaginary, fanciful, shadowy, unreal, chimerical.

II. n. 1. That which exists only in idea; a conception that exceeds reality.

A rigid solid . . . is an ideal; no substance is absolutely rigid.

A. Daniell, Prin. of Physics, p. 199.

2. An imaginary object or individual in which an idea is conceived to be completely realized; hence, a standard or model of perfection: as, the ideal of beauty, virtue, etc.; Bayard, the ideal of chivalry.

While the idea gives rules, the ideal serves as the archetype for the permanent determination of the copy; and we have no other rule of our actions but the conduct of that divine man within us, with which we compare ourselves, and by which we judge and better ourselves, though we can never reach it. These ideals, though they cannot claim objective reality, are not therefore to be considered as chimeras, but supply reason with an indispensable standard, because it requires the concept of that which is perfect of its kind, in order to estimate and measure by it the degree and number of the defects in the imperfect.

Kant, Critique of Pure Reason, tr. by Max Müller, II. 491.

Aesthetic effects call up not merely ideas, but ideals. A great work of art improves upon the real in two respects: it intensifies and it transfigures.

J. Ward, Encyc. Brit., XX. 70.

3. A standard of desire; an ultimate object or aim; a mental conception of what is most desirable: as, one's ideal of enjoyment; our ideals are seldom attained.—Beau ideal. See beau-ideal.—Syn. 2. Pattern, Model, etc. See example.

idealless (i-dē'-a-less), a. [<idea + -less.] Destitute of ideas.

idealisation, idealise, etc. See idealization, idealize, etc.

idealism (i-dē'-a-lizm), n. [= F. idéalisme = Sp. Pg. It. idealismo = D. G. idealismus = Dan. idealisme = Sw. idealism, < LL. idealis, ideal: see ideal and -ism.] 1. The metaphysical doctrine that the real is of the nature of thought; the doctrine that all reality is in its nature psychical.

It is our cognizance of the successiveness or transitoriness of feelings that makes us object intuitively to any idealism which is understood to imply an identification of the realities of the world with the feelings of men.

T. H. Green, Prolegomena to Ethics, § 37.

It is the very essence of the Kantian idealism that objects are not there till they are thought.

E. Caird, Philos. of Kant, p. 327.

2. Pursuit of the ideal; the act or practice of idealizing; especially, imaginative treatment of subjects; a striving after ideal beauty, truth, justice, etc.—3. In art, the effort to realize the highest type of any natural object by eliminating all its imperfect elements and combining the perfect into a whole which represents Nature, not as she is exhibited in any one example, but as she might be.—Absolute idealism, the doctrine of G. W. F. Hegel (1770–1831), that things derive their reality from their being made by thought, which has as objective existence as a part of the divine absolute idea (this being the organic unity of all thought), and that things are not merely phenomena to us, but are of their inner nature phenomena or thoughts. The term is by English writers sometimes applied to any dogmatic idealism, such as that of Berkeley.—Berkeleyan idealism, the doctrine of Bishop Berkeley (1685–1753), that the souls of men and of God, and the ideas in them, are the only existences, and that the reality of external things consists only in their permanence and coherency. Also called theistic, phenomenal, and empirical idealism.—Cosmotic idealism, the doctrine that the external world exists, but that we have no immediate knowledge of it.—Egotistical idealism, the doctrine that ideas are modes of the human mind itself, and are destitute of external prototypes.—Fichtean or subjective idealism, the doctrine of J. G. Fichte (1762–1814), that the universal subject or ego (not the ego of an individual person) is the source of the object, the external world, or non-ego.—Objective idealism, the doctrine of F. W. J. von Schelling (1775–1854), that the relation between the subject and the object of thought is one of part to the whole.—Platonic idealism, the doctrine that the absolute reason, that matter is extinct mind, and that the laws of physics are the same as those of mental representations.—Transcendental idealism, the doctrine of Immanuel Kant (1724–1804), that the things to which the conceptions of reality, actuality, etc., are applicable are merely phenomena or appearances, and not things-in-themselves, or things as they are apart from their relation to the thinker. Things-in-themselves are held to be absolutely unknowable.

idealist (i-dē'-a-list), n. [= F. idéaliste = Sp. Pg. It. idealista = D. Dan. Sv. idealist, < LL. idealis, ideal: see ideal and -ist.] 1. One who holds some form of the philosophical doctrine of idealism: opposed to realist.

All are idealists, to whom the world of sense and time is a delusion and snare, and who regard the Idea as the only substance.

J. F. Clarke, Ten Great Religions, v. § 3.

2. One who pursues or dwells upon the ideal; a seeker after the highest beauty or good.—

3. An imaginative, unpractical person; a day-dreamer.—Cosmotic idealist, one who holds that we have no immediate intuition of a real non-ego or external world, but who nevertheless maintains that its existence is known inferentially by its effects in sensation. The term was introduced by Sir W. Hamilton (Reid's Works, note C).

idealistic (i-dē'-a-lis'tik), a. [<idealist + -ic.]

1. Relating or pertaining to the philosophical doctrine of idealism or to idealists.—2. Belonging to an ideal or ideals; striving for or imagining ideal perfection or good: as, idealistic poetry or art; idealistic dreams.

ideality (i-dē'-a-l'i-ti), n. [= F. idéalité = Sp. idealidad = It. idealità = G. idealität = Dan. Sv. idealitet, < *ML. idealita (t-s), ideality, < LL. idealis, ideal: see ideal and -ity.] 1. The condition or quality of being ideal: opposed to reality; in the Hegelian philos., existence only as an element, factor, or moment.

The reality of a body is its separateness as an isolated object: its ideality begins when its reality is abolished and it has become a moment or dynamic element in a larger unity.

Wallace.

2. The faculty or capacity of forming ideals.

Thus we might expect to find, wherever the fancy, the imagination, and the ideality are strong, some traces of a sentiment innate in the human organization.

R. F. Burton, El-Medinal, p. 325.

3. That which is ideal or unreal.

Sensuous certitude and the abstract classifications of science have put to flight the winged and mist-clad idealities of philosophy.

Jour. Spec. Phil., XIX. 84.

Transcendental ideality, existence regarded as dependent upon the conditions of possible experience.

We maintain the empirical reality of space, so far as every possible experience is concerned, but at the same time its transcendental ideality: that is to say, we maintain that space is nothing, if we leave out of consideration the condition of a possible experience, and accept it as something on which things by themselves are in any way dependent.

Kant, Critique of Pure Reason, tr. by Max Müller, II. 25.

idealization (i-dē'-a-l'i-zā'shon), n. [= F. idéalisat = Sp. idealización; as idealize + -ation.]

The act of forming in idea or in thought; the act of making ideal. Also spelled idealisation.

idealize (i-dē'-a-liz), v.; pret. and pp. idealized, ppr. idealizing. [< F. idéaliser = Sp. idealizar = Pg. idealizar = D. idealisieren = G. idealisieren = Dan. idealisere = Sw. idealisera; as ideal + -ize.]

I. trans. To make ideal; give form to in accordance with any preconceived ideal; embody in an ideal form: as, to idealize a portrait.

The kinship of pity to love is shown among other ways in this, that it idealizes its object.

H. Spencer, Man vs. State, p. 18.

II. intrans. To form ideals.

Also spelled idealise.

idealizer (i-dē'-a-l'i-zér), n. One who idealizes; an idealist. Also spelled idealiser.

There is no idealizer like unavailing regret, all the more if it be a regret of fancy as much as of real feeling.

Lowell, Among my Books, 2d ser., p. 67.

ideally (i-dē'-al-i), adv. 1. In idea; in thought.

Factors ideally separated from their combinations.

H. Spencer, Study of Sociol., p. 321.

Truth to nature can be reached ideally, never historically.

Lowell, Study Windows, p. 217.

2. According to an ideal.

ideologic (i-dē'-a-loj'ik), a. See ideologic.

ideologue (i-dē'-a-loj), n. See ideologue.

ideology (i-dē'-al'ō-jī), n. See ideology.

ideal-real (i-dē'-al-ré'al), a. Both ideal and real; having the characteristics of ideal-realism.

The half-and-half systems, the ideal-real, as they are called, held by so many in the present day in Germany, are in the position of a professedly neutral person between two hostile armies, exposed to the fire of both.

New Princeton Rev., I. 22.

ideal-realism (i-dē'-al-ré'al-izm), n. A metaphysical doctrine which combines the principles of idealism and realism. The ideal-realism of Schleiermacher, Beneke, Trendelenburg, Ueberweg, Wundt, and others consists in acknowledging the correctness of Kant's account of the subjective origin of space, time, and the conceptions of cause, substance, and the like, and in holding, in addition, that these things have also an existence altogether independent of the mind. The ideal-realism of Ulrich, B. Peirce, and others consists in the opinion that nature and the mind have such a community as to impart to our guesses a tendency toward the truth, while at the same time they require the confirmation of empirical science.

ideate (i-dē'-ät), v.; pret. and pp. ideated, ppr. ideating. [<idea + -ate. Cf. equiv. Sp. Pg. idear = It. ideare.] I. trans. 1†. To form in idea or thought; fancy.

Letters mingle souls,

For thus friends absent speak. . . . But for these I could ideate nothing which I could please.

Donne, To Sir Henry Wotton.

2. To apprehend mentally so as to retain and be able to recall; fix permanently in the mind. [Rare.]

II. intrans. To form ideas; think.

Feeling in general is . . . the immediate consciousness of the rising or falling of one's power of ideating.

G. T. Ladd, Physiol. Psychology, p. 503.

ideate (i-dē'-ät), a. and n. [<idea + -ate.] I. a. In metaph., produced by an idea, specifically by a Platonic idea; existing by virtue of its participation in an idea.

II. n. In metaph., the correlative or object of an idea; the real or actual existence correlating with an idea. G. H. Lewes.

ideation (i-dē'-ä'shon), n. [<ideate + -ion.] The process or the act of forming ideas.

There is in it [the will] an element of conception, ideation, or intellectual retentiveness.

A. Bain, Emotions and Will, p. 352.

ideational (i-dē'-ä'shon-al), a. [<ideation + -al.] Pertaining to the faculty of ideation, or to the exercise of this faculty; of or pertaining to the formation of ideas.

What has never been presented could hardly be represented, if the ideational process were undisturbed: even in our dreams white negroes or round squares, for instance, never appear.

J. Ward, Encyc. Brit., XX. 62.

ideative (i-dē'-ä-tiv), a. [<ideate + -ive.] Same as ideational.

The acoustic images, by awaking in the ideative field the correlated ideas, render the words spoken by another intelligible.

Allen and Neurol. (trans.), VIII. 215.

idel, a. An obsolete spelling of idle.

idem (i'dem), adv. [LL. idem, m., n., eadem, f., the same, < i, a pronominal root in is, he, that, etc. (see he), + -dem, a demonstrative suffix; cf. ibidem. Hence ident, etc.] The same; the same as above or before: used to avoid repeating something already written. Abbreviated id.

idemfaciend (i-dem-fä'shiend), a. [<L. idem, the same, + faciendus, ger. of facere, make, produce: see fact.] Giving itself as product when multiplied by a certain basis. Thus, if i is the basis of a multiple algebra, and j is any other vid such that ij = j, then j is said to be idemfaciend.

idemfacient (i-dem-fä'shiënt), a. [<L. idem, the same, + facien (t-s), ppr. of facere, make, produce: see fact.] Giving itself as product when multiplied into a certain basis. Thus, if i is the basis of a multiple algebra, and j is another vid such that ji = j, then j is said to be idemfacient.

idemfactor (i-dem-fak'tor), n. [<L. idem, the same, + factor, one who makes: see factor.] A quantity or symbol which is at once idemfacient and idemfaciend.

idempotent (i-dem'pō-tent), n. [L. idem, the same, + potens (t-s), having power: see potent.] In multiple algebra, a quantity which multiplied into itself gives itself. Ordinary unity is idempotent.

identic (i-den'tik), a. [Formerly identick, identique, < F. identique = Sp. idéntico = Pg. It. identico (cf. D. G. identisch = Dan. Sw. identisk, < ML. identicus, the same, < L. idem (in identidem, repeatedly), < idem, the same: see identity.] Same as identical. [Rare.]

Lady, your bright
And radiant eyes are in the right;
The beard's th' identique beard you knew,
The same numerically true.

S. Butler, Hudibras, II. i. 149.

To aggregate the particles of matter in identic shapes.
Duke of Argyll.

identical (i-den'ti-kal), a. [< identic + -al.] 1. Being the same; absolutely indistinguishable; distinguishable only as points of view of that which is one in its own being: also used loosely to express the fact that two or more things compared are the same in the particulars considered, or differ in no essential point. Absolute justice and absolute love are never antagonistic, but identical.

Theodore Parker, Love and the Affections.
I cannot remember a thing that happened a year ago, without a conviction, as strong as memory can give, that I, the same identical person who now remember that event, did then exist.

Reid, Intellectual Powers, iii. 1.

The choice of a representative was once identical with the choice of a chief. Our House of Commons had its roots in local gatherings like those in which uncivilized tribes select head warriors. H. Spencer, Prin. of Sociol., § 496.

2. Expressing identity.

That a ton equals a ton is an identical proposition; that the weight of a ton of coals equals the weight of 20 cart of stones is an equivalent proposition.
G. H. Lewes, Probs. of Life and Mind, 1st ser., II. ii. § 80.

Identical equation. See equation.—Identical note, in diplomacy, an official communication in terms agreed upon by two or more governments, each of which sends a copy to some power which they wish to influence or warn by a simultaneous expression of unanimous opinion.—Identical operation, an operation which leaves the operand unchanged.—Identical proposition (ML. propositio identica, a phrase originating with the Scotists in the 14th century), a proposition which is true by virtue of the definitions of the terms together with the rules of formal logic. Thus, "Everything that is at once tall and either a man or a woman is either a tall man or a tall woman," is an identical proposition.

If those who blame my calling them trifling propositions had but read, and been at the pains to understand, what I had above writ in very plain English, they could not but have seen that by identical propositions I mean only such wherein the same term, importing the same idea, is affirmed of itself: which I take to be the proper signification of identical propositions; and concerning all such, I think I may continue safely to say that to propose them as instructive is no better than trifling. . . . But if men will call propositions identical wherein the same term is not affirmed of itself, whether they speak more properly than I others must judge.

Locke, Human Understanding, IV. viii. § 3. identically (i-den'ti-kal-i), adv. In an identical manner; with actual or intrinsic sameness; often followed by the same or alike to express absolute sameness or likeness in every particular: as, two identically worded notes; their views are identically the same or alike.—Identically true, in older writings, said of that which is true as a fact by virtue of the identity in existence of the subject and predicate; now used in the sense of that which is true as an identical proposition or equation.

identicalness (i-den'ti-kal-nes), n. The state or quality of being identical; sameness.

She has an high opinion of her sex, to think they can charm so long a man so well acquainted with their identicalness.
Richardson, Clarissa Harlowe, IV. 201.

identifiable (i-den'ti-fi-ā-bl), a. [< identify + -able.] Capable of being identified.

identification (i-den'ti-fi-kā'shon), n. [= F. identification = Pg. identificação: see identify and -fication.] 1. The act of making or proving to be the same; the state of being made or regarded as the same.

I am not ready to admit the identification of the Romish faith with Gospel faith.
Bp. Watson, Charge.

Resemblance itself may be fatal to identification when the law of being is change. J. Ward, Encyc. Brit., XX. 81.

2. The act or process of establishing the identity of something; the act or process of determining what a given thing is, or who a given person is; specifically, in nat. hist., the determining of the species to which a given specimen belongs; also, the determination thus made.
